CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 23, 1912.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF PRIZE-FIGHT PICTURES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7027) to prohibit the interstate transportation of pictures of prize fights, and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 6, after "carriage," to insert "or to send or carry"; on page 2, in lines 2 and 3, to strike out "or any record or account of betting on the same"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to prohibit the importation and the interstate transportation of films or other pictorial representations of prize fights, and for other purposes."

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11628) authorizing John T. McCrosson and associates to construct an irrigation ditch on the island of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4948) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes."

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6340) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5623) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6978) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2904) to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to regulate the operation and equipment of the vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co., disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ROTHERMEL, Mr. LOBECK, and Mr. KAHN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 11628. An act authorizing John T. McCrosson and associates to construct an irrigation ditch on the island of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii; and

H. R. 21477. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of Local Division No. 417, of Peoria, and of Local Divisions Nos. 96 and 294, of Chicago, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, all in the State of Illinois, praying for the enactment of legislation granting to the publications of fraternal associations the privileges of second-class mail matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. BOURNE. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes (S. Rept. 955). I will state that the committee report will follow in a day or two, as soon as we can complete it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. CUMMINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 956) thereon.

Mr. THORNTON. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] gave notice of a desire to speak this morning. I understand that he is to be called from town, and, if agreeable to him, I now yield the floor to him for that purpose.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. President, my excuse for imposing upon the time of the Senate is because I am obliged to leave the city to-morrow, and I will be detained for some little time. Consequently I felt it my duty to address myself this morning to the subject I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate. I think Senators will bear me out in the statement that I have not used very much of the time during the present session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? The Chair appeals to Senators not to indulge in audible conversation. The Senator from Maine will proceed.

THE BOURNE BILL AND A POSTAL-EXPRESS SERVICE.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. President, for more than a generation the people of the country have been asking Congress for the enactment of legislation that would give them the advantages, enjoyed by the people of every other civilized country, of an adequate general parcel-post service. As the years went by and nothing was done conviction grew that Congress was indifferent to mere appeal. The voice of the people took on a more determined and significant tone, and to-day it has become a demand; and I know whereof I speak when I say that the farmers have made the securing of a thoroughgoing, adequate, postal package service, which will connect up the country and the city and bring producer and consumer together, their paramount issue. Promptly on the public announcement through the press of my succession to membership in this body I received letters from farmers and editors of the farm press in all parts of the country urging me as a farmer and direct representative of farmers to make the parcel post my first concern as a United States Senator.

I appreciate the compliment thus paid me by the farmers of this country, and can only hope to be equal to the responsibilities which go with its task. Senators may not know that in the 40 years this subject has been before the country no discussion of it has ever taken place on this floor. The subject is not a simple one, as, I regret to say, the public and nearly all those Members of Congress who have offered bills on the subject seem to regard it. These circumstances, I trust, will afford me sufficient excuse for rather prolonged consideration which I shall ask at your hands.

Let me premise that although nearly all countries are said to possess satisfactory agencies for the transportation of small shipments, prior to this Congress, so far as I am able to discover, no literature has existed to aid the student. Nothing has been done in Congress; nothing in the academies, even in those countries of Europe where the parcel-post agencies obtain, in the way of expository treatments of the subject, giving its characteristic features and essential elements. It remained for the Hon. DAVID J. LEWIS, of Maryland, to make the first thorough study of the subject, which is now in published form as Senate Document No. 379. Whatever the Senate may think of the constructive measures deemed necessary for relief by Mr. LEWIS, and I may add myself, Members of this body who wish to acquaint themselves with the elements of this subject will find his study the most painstaking and informing which has yet been printed. For the general analysis of the controlling conceptions of the subject, as well as the statistical and academical data which I submit, I wish now to give credit to his study without further reference in the course of my remarks.

FUNCTION OF THE PARCEL POST.

What is it we intend to do? What results do we expect to accomplish in the enactment of the legislation on the subject? In fine, what is the function of a parcel post? I would be pleased to have you closely follow my answer to this question. It is to provide effective transportation for the small shipment. And what is the small shipment? It is the article produced in retail form to which only transportation or delivery need be added to make it available for retail buyer or consumer.

The President of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. has declared, and his figures are substantiated by those of our own Department of Agriculture, that the farmers who raise our vital necessaries get about $6,000,000,000 for what finally sells to the consumers for about $13,000,000,000. He said, in part:

> Last year's agricultural products were worth $9,000,000,000 to the farmers. The Government used farm values in getting figures for this total. Assuming that the farmers kept one-third of the products for their own use, the consumers paid more than $13,000,000,000 for what the producers received $6,000,000,000. The cost of getting the year's products from producers to consumers amounted to the enormous sum of $7,000,000,000. The real problem to deal with is not high cost of living. It is high cost of selling.—B. F. Yoakum, chairman St. Louis & San Francisco R. R.

The report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1910 gives the following as the percentages of the prices paid by the consumer which the farmer received for the foodstuffs named:

	Per cent.
Poultry	55.1
Eggs, by the dozen	69.0
Celery, by the bunch	60.0
Strawberries, by quart	48.9
Oranges, by dozen	20.3
Melons, by pound	50.0
Potatoes, by bushel	59.3
Watermelons, singly	33.5
Turkeys	63.4
Cabbage, by the head	48.1
Apples, by bushel	55.6
Apples, by barrel	66.0
Onions, by peck	27.8
Green peas, by quart	60.0
Parsnips, by bunch	60.0
Turnips, by bunch	60.0

This means that it cost $7,000,000,000 to get the products of the farm to the consumer. This added cost between the producer and the consumer was largely caused by the inefficient and insufficient transportation system, and if one-half of this $7,000,000,000, or $3,500,000,000, should be taken off the transportation rates and divided between the producer and the consumer it would result very materially to the advantage of both by increasing the profits of the producer and reducing the cost to the consumer. The high cost of living in the vital necessaries would thus really be reached and remedied.

Stated broadly, the characterizing function of the proposed agency is to provide direct transportation from producer to consumer of the retail forms of production—that is, of articles in sizes and forms adapted to the wants of the ultimate purchaser or consumer. With some exceptions these retail forms may be classed as the small shipment for which it is desired to secure adequate and economical transportation. And it is appropriate to suggest, as will be clearly seen upon investigation, that if the desired transportation facilities direct from the producer to consumer were introduced a very substantial measure of relief would follow in the matter of the high cost of living, especially with respect to the vital necessaries of life.

Nearly all farm products in use on our tables are produced in retail form. Because no direct conduit of transportation from the producer to the consumer is available these retail forms are now converted into wholesale forms by the buying collector at the farm and then handed over to the wholesale trade, where they are again sorted into wholesale units and turned over to the retail trade, where they are reconverted into retail forms and given to the consumer, often stale, as the third or fourth purchaser at a price commercially increased by nearly 100 per cent.

If the manufacturers of this country were denied the direct-from-producer transportation they now enjoy for wholesale forms of purchase many, perhaps most, of our industrial workshops would cease to operate. Coal has direct transportation from the mines to the factory, the operator paying the first and not the third price. What would become of our industries if this operator were subject to the wasteful roundabout commercial processes that penalize the consumer of the food products of the country?

THE RAILROADS AND THE SMALL SHIPMENT.

When we think of transportation we naturally first turn to the great railroads of our country. I call the attention of the Senate to two facts in this connection: First, the railroads do not articulate with the farms and can not provide transportation direct from the producer to the consumer; second, the railroads are engaged in the wholesale as distinguished from the retail traffic. Their minimum shipment is 100 pounds, and they do not provide collect-and-delivery service. But the consumer very rarely goes to a freight depot and seldom requires as much as 100 pounds of any single retail form, certainly not of farm products and the many other necessaries. Besides the railroads have found it necessary to establish a minimum fee of 25 cents and 30 cents for a shipment, no matter how low the published rate may be and no matter how diminutive the shipment. At first one may feel disposed to grumble at this arbitrary charge, but when railway practices are investigated it is found that the existing railway régime is quite incapable of handling the small shipment at rates proportioned to its value and size, because of the amount of administrative service their methods render necessary. Whether the shipment be large or small, the journey short or long, the railroad company is compelled to render 20 acts of transportation attention for such shipment. These acts are as follows:

The railway company employee—
(1) Unloads articles from consignor's vehicle.
(2) Loads article in car.
(3) Ascertains rate to be paid.
(4) Makes out bill of lading.
(5) Makes out waybill and sends copy to auditor and the train conductor.
(6) Receiving agent, destination, receipts to conductor—
(7) Sends notice to consignee.
(8) Unloads package from car.
(9) Takes receipt of consignsee.
(10) Loads it on consignee's wagon.
(11) Agent gets money for shipment—
(12) Copies bill of lading into record of freight forwarded.
(13) Copies bill of lading into record of freight received.
(14) Sends statement of freight "sent" to auditor.
(15) Sends statement of freight "received" to auditor.
(16) Auditor checks bill of lading against records of sending agent—
(17) Checks bill of lading against record of receiving agent.
(18) Advises treasurer of money due by each agent.
(19) Makes statistical report from bill of lading.
(20) Calculates, per bill of lading, amount payable to the different railways.

It is perfectly obvious that present railroad practice precludes the possibility of the railroads making rates for the small shipment sufficiently low to permit the potential traffic to move from the producer to its natural market with a profit, and by potential traffic I mean, of course, those articles which may be produced at marketable prices for which there is an effective demand. Meanwhile, this seems to be the place to observe that in the postal system the postage stamp takes the place of 15 of the acts of railroad transportation attention above set forth. This is a fact at this moment, and plainly indicates that, while railroad practices preclude, postal practices clearly permit the making of a rate that will enable the small shipment to move. Wholesale shipments constitute a type of their own and call for transportation practices appropriate to such type. Railroads are organized primarily to handle the wholesale traffic, and their practices, which weigh but little upon the wholesale traffic, are such as to penalize in costliness the small shipment out of the railroad transportation of the country. Equally true it is that the small shipment constitutes a type of its own; that it has, so to speak, anatomical and physiological laws of its own. The postal system is organized primarily to handle the small shipment. It handles the average mail piece at a cost of 1½ (1.56) cents apiece. If the practices applied by the railroads to the wholesale shipment were applied by the postal system to the mail piece, our letters could not be carried at less than 8 or 10 cents apiece.

THE EXPRESS COMPANY AND THE SMALL SHIPMENT.

When we think of the small shipment, the express company comes to mind. It is the factitious and unnatural "parcel post" of the United States. Functionally speaking, it ought to carry the small shipment and give adequate service and rates that would permit the potential traffic to move. It does not accomplish these objects, and for three reasons, any of which, to be fair in the discussion, it is unable to remedy. First, it does not reach the farm, and can not be made to reach the farm, since the rural free-delivery structure can not be taken over by the express companies or be maintained by them if taken over. Second, its transportation practices, or "transportation accounting," are similar in character to that of the railroads, and have the same effect in forcing a rate which is abnormal on the small shipment. I insert a list of 11 acts of transportation attention given by the express companies to the small shipment, which are replaced by the postage stamp in the Post Office Department for the like shipment:

The express company—
(1) Ascertains the rate to be paid.
(2) Makes out waybill.
(3) Copies waybill into record of shipment "forwarded."
(4) Copies same into record of shipment "received."
(5) Makes statement of "shipment sent" to auditor.
(6) Makes same of shipment "received."
(7) Auditor checks waybills against record of "sending" agent.
(8) Auditor checks same against record of "receiving" agent.
(9) In case of "through" waybills previous items repeated.
(10) Auditor makes division of percentages going to express company and the railway or railways.
(11) In case of "through" waybills auditor makes like division of percentages between express companies and railways.

If we but note the duplication of work these acts involve in unnecessary accounting and the consequent useless expense, and realize that it is going on in thousands of offices throughout the country, we get a faint idea of the enormous expense the postage stamp would eliminate. And when we consider that the average express shipment is slightly less than 33 pounds (32.80), and the low relative rate it ought to bear, we are able to appreciate the destructive influence of this wasteful transportation accounting upon the potential express traffic. One thing is certain, and that is that the small shipment, if it is to enjoy a rate insuring its traffic mobility, must be divorced from this transportation accounting. It will be easy enough to provide protective practices against its loss in those instances where exceptional value or susceptibility to theft so require. Very simple devices for this purpose already exist in Germany, and are easily conceivable here. Third, the express rates are prohibitive—are about three times as high as they should be—and are shown to be destructive to the potential traffic.

We should expect express charges to be higher per ton here than abroad—as much higher as our freight-per-ton charges. But no necessary economic cause is known which justifies a substantially higher proportion or ratio of the express to the freight charges here as compared with other countries. The average express charge per ton here is shown to be $31.20, while the average freight charge is $1.90 per ton, giving a ratio of the express charge to the freight charge of 16 (16.42) to 1. This express charge includes the cost of such collect-and-delivery service as is rendered, covering, it is thought, about 90 per cent of the traffic. In the table now inserted the element of the expense of the express companies for collecting and delivering, amounting to 11.50 per cent, is excluded, because many of the countries do not include this factor of cost. The table embraces 10 countries, while the specific data upon which the ratios are based are set forth in Appendix B. All countries have been included where the express data are clearly distinguishable from general freight statistics.

Ratios of average express charges to average freight charges in 11 countries.

Countries.	Average express charge per ton.	Average freight charge per ton.	Ratios of average express to freight charges.
Argentina	$6.51	$1.95	3.2 to 1
Austria	3.77	.74	5.0 to 1
Belgium	[1] 4.92	.53	[1] 9.3 to 1
Denmark	5.49	.87	6.3 to 1
France	6.88	.95	7.2 to 1
Germany	3.80	.76	5.0 to 1
Hungary	3.68	.93	3.9 to 1
Netherlands	2.43	.67	3.6 to 1
Norway	1.90	.49	3.8 to 1
Prussia	4.32	.86	5.0 to 1
Average for 10 countries			5.23 to 1
United States	27.61	1.90	14.53 to 1

[1] Belgium delivers parcels.

Ratio express tonnage, 10 countries, to freight tonnage	1.060
Ratio express tonnage in United States to freight tonnage	0.517
Ratio express receipts, 10 countries, to freight receipts	5.890
Ratio express receipts in United States to freight receipts	7.776
Normal revenue ratio for United States as per express receipts above	2.460
Excess of American express receipts (216 per cent)	5.316

From this table it appears that while Argentina charges 3 times, Austria 5 times, Belgium 9 times, Denmark 6 times, France 7 times, Germany (including Prussia) 5 times, Hungary, the Netherlands, and Norway about 4 times as much for carrying a ton of express as of freight, the express companies of the United States charge nearly 15 times as much, excluding the cost of their collection and delivery.

No further statement need be made to show that the charges of American express companies are prohibitively excessive and such as to disqualify this service as a transportation agency. The instances given represent matter carried by passenger trains in all instances, and while higher charges for both the express and freight tonnage in America are justified, there is no necessary economic reason for a higher ratio of express charges to freight charges. The presence of the express company is the only circumstance distinguishing express transportation here from that of the instances cited. In those the express company has no part; the work is done by the railways. As we shall see later, the deficiencies of the express companies are constitutional, not gratuitous merely, and are such as can not be remedied through corporate agencies.

EXPRESS RATE MAKING UNNATURAL.

Another condition is equally prohibitive in its effect on the small shipment. It is a condition entirely anomalous in the transportation of any country and comes from the presence of an intruder—the express company. Let us put an express rate maker at work in order to illustrate its character. Let us say he is making a rate on a 5-pound package from Washington to Baltimore, about 40 miles. He puts down first 6 cents, let us say, to pay for this accounting and some overhead charges; he puts down 5 cents to pay for collection and delivery, and adds 2 cents for profits for the company, making 13 cents in all. But the railroad has to be paid. How shall he compute its share—according to service standards? No; not at all. He must compute it according to the contract between the express company and the railroad; and that contract, on the average, provides that the railroads must get 47.50 per cent of the final rate. So he adds 12 cents for the railroad, which makes a charge of 25 cents. But that 12 cents to the railroad means $1.42 per ton-mile on the 5-pound package, while at the same time, under rates made by the same express rate maker, traveling on the same train to the same point, the 100-pound package at the rate of 50 cents pays the railroad only 14 cents a ton-mile. Because of the anomalous connection of the express company with the subject, its merely contractual right to be there at all, the package is overloaded 10 cents for railroad transportation, and the charge becomes 25 cents instead of 15 cents, for about 2 cents is what the package ought to pay the railroad. The railroad would not, if it were making this rate, overload it in that way. I believe it would impose only the relative burden, but the express rate maker has no alternative under the express-railway contract.

Take the other horn of the matter. The express-rate maker is at work on a rate for a 100-pound package from New York to the Pacific coast. There, manifestly, the important thing is to pay the railroad for its service, which is nearly the whole service. He sets down $6.41 for the railroad. But the railroad can not receive, under the contract, more than 47½ per cent of the rate imposed on the shipper, and so the rate maker must add $7.09, making a total charge of $13.70, in order that the railroad can get what it ought to get. So in either instance the regulatory boards of the State or Nation can not reduce these rates without doing injustice to the express company on the short or the railroad company on the long journey. Stated in another way, we have—

Rate for 5 pounds, 36 miles:
Necessary express loading on	$0.14
Contractual loading to pay railway	.13
Resulting rate	.27
Rate for 100 pounds, 3,000 miles:
Necessary loading to pay railway	6.41
Contractual loading for express company	7.09

In brief, the railway, on the small package and short journey, at one extreme, secures ten times what it ought, while on the other the express company accomplishes the same result. At no point, perhaps, does either get just what it ought to get for its part of the service, unless it be on the statistical average package of 32.80 pounds with its product of 51 cents. Meanwhile, perhaps, at no other point does the merchandise package pay just what it ought to pay on service standards. It must, under the contract, be either overloaded to protect the express company or the railway. All this is certainly true, even if the general financial results to the railways and the express companies should go unchallenged. And who is to blame? Manifestly the express railway contract. No other results are possible under its terms. The general results may have been highly satisfactory to the express companies, but to the railways and the country the results simply signify a restriction of the quantum of the express traffic to one-half or one-third of its normal volume. Indeed, it is not improbable that the express railway contract is the principal cause of the higher ratio (16.42 as against 5.23) of the express to the freight charge here as compared with other countries.

REGULATION INADEQUATE.

It is obvious, of course, that the inability of the express companies to reach the farm excludes them as a remedy. But even if this deficiency might be conceivably removed, a normal express rate, sufficiently low to insure the mobility of the potential traffic, is quite beyond the remedial reach of regulation. The express company is not a normal transportation agency. All its relations to the small shipment show it to be a parasite, a term which I use not as an epithet but in the way of description. Ordinarily one would say that if a transportation rate were two or three times as high as it ought to be the Interstate Commerce Commission would be the appropriate tribunal for relief. This phase of the subject of regulation brings up one of the very anomalous characteristics of the express companies.

For years they have been paying, as a whole, near to if not more than 100 per cent profits on the real investment, and yet the proportion of the average express rate which is profit was less than 7 per cent last year. A slight reduction in the rates would wipe out this margin and perhaps leave a deficit. With a normal transportation agency, the facts are very different. The profit in the average railway rate amounts to 30 per cent. If the railroads were paying 6 per cent on their capital and you wished to reduce their rates so as to produce dividends of only 5 per cent you would have this 30 per cent to play on, and a reduction of 5 per cent in the rate would leave a profit margin of 25 per cent of the total rate. In the case of the express rates one-half of 1 per cent profit in the rate would produce a 10 per cent dividend on the capital used in the business, but a one-half per cent margin would be so small that the slightest changes in business might convert it into a deficit. Of course no Government tribunal would order such a margin, and I am not sure that it could safely reduce the present margin of less than 7 per cent, as a perturbation of the traffic might mean a deficit. Nearly all the efforts made by the State regulatory tribunals have been struck down by the courts on this ground. Thoughtful men will recognize that you can not trifle with such a small margin. All this is true, because the parasitic character of the express company enables it to proceed with relatively no capital, and yet capital enough to enforce the protections vouchsafed to proprietary rights.

A like verdict must be passed on the suggestion sometimes made that the express company, being parasitic and incompetent, the railroads should be compelled to perform the service; but the railroads do not articulate with the farm. This single deficiency in itself is fatal. Besides, as I have shown earlier in my remarks, their practices preclude the economical movement of the small shipment. What the small shipment requires is a rate somewhere as diminutive as its size, and in order to get this the utmost simplicity of administrative process is necessary. To abolish the express companies—about 14 in number—and to require the operating railroads—about 900 in number—to perform the service, or converting 14 express companies into 900, would be only adding to the multiplicity of intercorporate relationships and transportation accounting which already penalize the small shipments out of the transportation of the country. The opinion of one of the foremost railroad presidents of the United States upon this subject I consider to be conclusive. He says:

> It is gravely to be doubted if the railways, as a rule, could transact the (express) business so as to net as much out of it as the express company pays them.
> Assume that the roads radiating from Chicago should cancel their contracts with the express companies and organize to handle small packages: The first result would be an enormous economic waste in the duplication, triplication, and quadruplication of terminal expenses. At present the collection and delivery for a dozen roads is in the hands of one agency. Multiply this by the hundreds of cities and towns where the same conditions would prevail and it is easy to see that the eleven million of dollars of profit the express companies secure might readily fall short of what the railroads would lose should they discard the agency.

THE SMALL SHIPMENT AND POSTAL EFFICIENCY.

I believe it is clear from what has been shown that the postal system alone possesses a structure sufficiently extensive in its service to reach the country and practices and methods sufficiently adapted to the diminutive shipment to gratify its peculiar and commanding needs. There may be those who are disposed to underrate the working efficiency of the postal organization of the United States. They do not doubt that in other countries, notably the principal countries of the Continent, like Germany, France, and England, public industrial agencies have been successfully conducted, and with satisfactory efficiency. This success is attributed by some to the alleged presence of a class in those countries accustomed to command and another class equally accustomed to obey, with the resulting advantages which follow from discipline in collective undertakings. Whatever the value of such opinions may be, they are assuredly erroneous as applied to the postal system of the United States, for it is certainly the most efficient agency of its kind. The following comparison of the number of mail pieces handled per postal employee per annum in the countries named affords sufficient evidence of this statement:

Number of pieces of mail matter handled per employee in England, France, Germany, and the United States.

Countries.	1908	1909
England	31,117	.....
France	38,241	.....
Germany	25,901	.....
United States	51,591	54,239

In the cases of France and Great Britain the number of employees was diminished by one-fourth the estimated number employed in the telephone and telegraph service. In the German figures the same reduction for the telegraph and telephone employees is raised to one-third. The comparison speaks for itself. We have apparently the best working postal organization, and its wagons on the rural routes are waiting empty to receive the small shipment traffic now denied them.

The obvious advantage of the postal system handling the small shipment is adduced from the circumstance that it is handling now the smallest shipment in the world, the ordinary mail piece, and is handling it, too, at a less cost per piece than any other country of the world with the possible exception of Belgium, differences of wages, sparseness of population, and transportation distances notwithstanding. It is only the mind that hates all forms of public endeavor, except those the most archaic, who will deny the postal system of our country the verdict of "well done, thou good and faithful servant." My studies of this subject make it clear to me that not only is the postal organization excellently adapted to the task of moving this small shipment from consignor to consignee, but that it is the only organization sufficiently extensive in its scope and sufficient and economical in its operations to give adequate service to the small shipment.

FUTILE PARCEL-POST SCHEMES.

What, again I ask, is the function of the parcel post? Obviously to provide an agency, a real working agency, to move the small shipment. Let us investigate briefly the technical or regulatory elements necessary to enable this small shipment to move. Dr. W. A. Henry, former dean of the agricultural department of the University of Wisconsin, has epitomized these elements, and I will give the Senate the advantage of his classification:

ESSENTIAL CONDITIONS OF SMALL-SHIPMENT TRANSPORT.

(a) An enlargement of the mailing privileges to include factory and farm products and other matter popularly and commercially desirable.

(b) Weight limit high enough to meet the needs of shippers and secure relative lowness of rates. (A rigid 11-pound limit would needlessly prevent the traffic attaining the quantitative character necessary to economical service.) Also the use and return of hampers, etc.

(c) The fullest C. O. D. privileges. (Consignors now enjoy these with the railway and express companies. To withhold them from farmers and others as postal facilities would simply destroy the potential traffic.)

(d) Rates only so high as the articles can afford to pay and still move to their market with a profit. (Flat rates for all distance, or rates uniform for all kinds of articles, tend to prevent the traffic moving.)

(e) Provision for administrative readjustment of rates, zones, weight limits, service conditions, etc., by experts who can adapt the rates and service conditions to their function of moving the potential traffic and protecting the Treasury.

(f) Postal pay to the railways as low as the express companies pay the railways. (The latest data show that the postal department paid 13.2 cents a ton-mile, while the express companies paid 7 cents a ton-mile, on the gross weights of their traffics, excluding equipment weight in both cases.)

(g) All the privileges and facilities from the railways that are given to the express companies: Provisions for the insurance or indemnification of shippers for losses. Complete power in the administrative agency to supply any other condition necessary to economical and effective conduct of the service.

It must be plain to any Member of the Senate who gives this subject an attention proportionate to its importance that of the seven elements enumerated not one can be omitted without an organic deficiency in the agency itself. Our busy constituents at home may be pardoned for regarding the parcel post unanalytically as the child regards a horse. When children, to our limited experience a horse represented four legs, a head, a trunk, and a tail, and in pictorially defining it, leaving nothing to chance, we labeled it, "This is a horse." To our limited experience the heart, the lungs, the liver, the stomach, and the kidneys, absolutely essential to horse locomotion, were nonexistent. I regret to say that such has been the indifference and incompetence of parcel-post thought and investigation in Congress that the illustration of purility I have given is only too applicable to the situation at hand. The vital organs or elements of a parcel-post agency, enumerated by Dr. Henry and obvious to any person as soon as mentioned, are singularly absent, one and all, from the schemes which they have offered to this Congress.

Mr. President, such parcel-post bills, if accepted, would be inadequate and would prove but disappointing in operation. Time does not permit me to take up each of those bills to prove this statement, but I do feel it a duty to take up the measure now most prominently spoken of in the Senate, namely, the bill of the Senator from Oregon, chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

THE BOURNE BILL.

In discussing this measure I wish not to be considered as wanting in kindliness to its author, however unworthy of him and the great needs of the subject and the people I consider his tentative measure to be. I can only attribute its defects to the circumstances first suggested in this address, namely, that a body of competent and serviceable literature on the parcel post to guide his efforts has been almost entirely wanting.

If the Senate will pardon the simplicity of my illustration, I would say that we all understand that plant and animal life have each their physiological attributes and organs, each indispensable to vital action and progress. The agency necessary to the movement of the small shipment may be characterized in the same way. It, too, must have a full complement of vital prerogatives and privileges if it is to become anything more than an idle paper structure wanting physiological powers for action or effect. Let me take up separately the elements which are absolutely essential to the life of such a structure and discuss them in the order they are stated by Dr. Henry and in relation to the Bourne bill.

MAILING PRIVILEGE.

Of course, a shipment or parcel can receive no service from the parcel-post agency unless the bill gives the privilege of mailing or entry to such shipment. The Bourne bill makes no enlargement of the mailing privilege.

Under the various mailing classes as they have been defined by the Post Office Department's construction of the statute nothing produced on the farm except "queen bees" and "dried fruits" can be shipped by post. I understand that the author of the bill intends this very result and is adverse to giving the parcel-post privileges to produce of the farm. What objection he may have has not been stated. Certain it is that of all the great advantages to follow an adequate transport of the small shipment, that of the consumer securing his table necessaries fresh from the farm and direct as the first purchaser, rather than the third or fourth, is the paramount advantage. I not only suggest that unless this possible traffic is made mailable the postal van will have to return empty from the farm to the town or city, but I may also add that the potential traffic from the farm to the town or city is normally as great or very much greater than from the town to the farm. Of course, if the wagon must return empty all that possible revenue must be lost; and since the public must pay for the service full or empty the exclusion of farm products from the postal van can only operate to penalize instead of promote the public welfare. The empty return trip will cost almost as much as the full trip would cost and might be made the means of securing substantially lower rates on traffic both ways.

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from Oregon can give some reason for this defect in his measure? I can not.

MAXIMUM WEIGHT PRIVILEGE.

In Belgium, Germany, Austria, and Hungary the weight privilege is extended above 100 pounds; though in those countries, differing from our own, the minimum freight shipment is graduated down to about 25 pounds, as compared with 100 pounds here. The obvious implication from our transportation conditions is that we should take the small shipment at the point where existing railway transportation denies it its privileges, namely, from 100 pounds and down, if, indeed, any maximum weight limit be fundamentally necessary at all.

There is now no maximum weight limit on second-class mail matter when mailed by the publishers. Similarly, the express companies impose no maximum weight limit on shipment intrusted to them, although their relations to the small shipment are practically identical with that of the post office. I mean by this to say that while the shipment is on the railroad, it makes no difference whether its weight be great or small, the trouble, if it arises at all, in the case of the post office could only come when the shipment left the railroad and carried the obligation of delivery to the consignee. With respect to this part of the transaction, the administrative authorities of the post office should be given discretion by regulation to determine the maximum weight and size limits for the purpose of collection and delivery. Senators can understand that in the progress of things these maxima might change very radically with the progress of improved conveyance and road construction.

I think it not inaccurate to say that this low weight limit of 11 pounds has been one of the circumstances which has strongly affected the attitude of the local or retail merchant toward this legislation. He, as much or more than anybody else, is entitled to relief from prohibitive express rates; but if the limit is to be 11 pounds, such a scheme gives him little or no relief, since he generally ships in larger quantities, securing the resulting quantitative declension in rates; but he may well think that this 11-pound limit is intended to be just large enough to get his customer away from him to the mail-order house with his cash orders, leaving the doubtful transactions as they were before. Partiality, however innocent its purpose may be, is always likely to produce such serious discriminations when enacted into public law. It is not surprising that the retail merchant looks upon the whole proceeding as a denial of the equal privileges to which he is justly entitled.

The truth is that the costliness of the rate will afford sufficient protection against using this agency for the shipment of very heavy quantities; and if this inference be doubted powers should be given to the postal management or the Interstate Commerce Commission to define the maximum weight from time to time as the operating facilities of the postal organization may render necessary.

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from Oregon can give some reason for this arbitrary and unprecedented 11-pound limit? I can not.

THE C. O. D. PRIVILEGE.

I need only suggest to the Members of this body that the C. O. D. practice with respect to both the price of the article shipped where credit relations have not been established and the rate itself are indispensable to commercial transportation in the United States. Suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power over the subject it now enjoys were to pass regulations compelling the consignor to pay the freight rate at the time of consignment, and a regulation denying him the right to have the price of the article paid by the consignee before the delivery of the article, what would the conclusion be as to the sanity of that reputable body? This is exactly the situation presented by the Bourne bill. The consignor must prepay the rate if he is to be allowed to use the service, and must also be denied the C. O. D. privilege of having the rate or the price of the shipment collected from the consignee. Of course, the express companies grant this C. O. D. privilege both as to the rate and the price of the shipment. If they did not, it is safe to say their business next year would produce a greater deficit than it has a profit in any year of their history. We understand that the usual method of transportation by railroad and express in commercial transactions is to have the consignee, whose obligations they are, pay both the transportation rate and the price of the article, where credit relations are not established. To deny these privileges to the postal agency is simply to deny relief from exorbitant express charges to the commercial world, and thus work needless discrimination and injustice, saying nothing of the loss of traffic necessary to a self-sustaining agency which such a denial would cause.

A concrete illustration of the effect of such a defect in the system may be given. Let us say that the rate under the Bourne bill for a given shipment were 25 cents, while the prevailing express rate were 40 cents. The consignor, unwilling to advance the rate to the post, would ship the article by express at the larger rate, because he would thus be able to make the consignee pay both the price and the rate. The postal system would lose 25 cents and the consignee would have to pay an extra 15 cents, all because of the obstinate refusal of his Government to grant him the C. O. D. privileges which universally belong to and go with such transportation.

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from Oregon can give some reason for denying this C. O. D. privilege to the patrons of his parcel post. I can not.

INDEMNIFICATION FOR LOST SHIPMENTS.

So far as I have been able to ascertain all of the parcel-post agencies abroad afford adequate indemnification to their shippers and patrons for shipments which may be lost. That this is actually essential to securing the potential commercial traffic goes without saying. Men are not disposed to needlessly risk the loss of their property without adequate assurance in this regard. In most countries the indemnification is provided through insurance features, and that method probably is preferable to the practice in vogue with the railroads and express companies, where some kind of negligence in the carrier must be shown. The Government might not wisely subject itself to such relatively expensive litigious methods of securing indemnification for the lost shipment; and a system of insurance would be much cheaper as well as much more satisfactory to all concerned. To deny this assurance of indemnification to the shipper could only operate to drive from the postal agency a considerable quantity of its normal traffic necessary to a self-sustaining system.

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from Oregon can give some reason for omitting this important matter from his bill. I can not.

RATES THE TRAFFIC CAN BEAR.

We have learned from our extensive experience in railroad transportation two very simple truths with regard to transportation charges. I shall state them categorically:

(a) The function of a body of transportation rates is to secure the gross revenue desirable.

(b) The function of the specific rate is to move the article it is applied to from its producer to its natural market with a profit.

I need not say to the Senate that in obedience to these maxims the railroads of the country have fashioned their rates to suit the ability of the article to pay them and move to its market. The railroads have divided the traffic into as many as eight classes, each paying a different rate, although the weight carried and the service rendered are practically identical. It is obvious enough that if they only charged the same rate for carrying silks and other high-priced articles which they charge for carrying coal or minerals they would suffer seriously in the matter of their necessary revenue (maxim A), while if they charged the same rate for carrying coal that they do for the high-priced articles they would be in danger of losing the largest part of the coal traffic.

What all this means, in effect, is that transportation charges are inherently taxes, possess the incidence and the ethics of taxation; and that different kinds of traffic, like different kinds of citizens, should only be taxed in proportion to their ability to pay. In the case of the Government or the State the rules of taxation can be made very general and be applied to the citizen's conditions without encountering those difficulties which might defeat their purpose. But in the case of transportation taxes, or charges, where the complexity of the subject matter requires special and prolonged study to fit the burden to the sustaining ability of the shipment's back, legislative rate making is obviously absurd and impracticable. If we wish to have rates at once necessary to a self-sustaining system and also sufficiently adapted to enable the shipment to pay it and move to its natural market, then I say to the Senate that a legislative body is as incapable of drafting those rates as it would be to make the astronomical observations and calculations necessary to determine the time of the day. This great legislative body has recognized the commanding sense of this view in all its relations with transportation. It does regulate railroad and express rates, but it regulates them, not legislatively, but through an administrative tribunal, the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has shown its competency through administrative freedom to deal with the subject matter in a practical way.

The Bourne measure seems to have gained nothing from the lessons and experience with regard to transportation rates. The rates fixed in it, if we except the first and last zones, are obviously about twice as high as they need be under his own showing as to cost elements. It is all very well to argue that the rates should be made sufficiently high to make the Treasury absolutely secure; if we do not ignore the correlative circumstance that if made needlessly high they will operate to needlessly kill the potential traffic and thus render the cost of conducting such traffic as may be offered as high or higher than the rates themselves. I have carefully analyzed the schedule of rates in this bill and I challenge Members of the Senate to compare these rates with the cost elements of the service as stated by the Senator from Oregon himself, and then not agree that they are excessively high from every standard.

For example, the experience of the express companies shows that the average cost of the collect-and-delivery service is about 6 cents for the average package of 33 pounds. The testimony before the Post Office Committee shows a local express company willing to contract to deliver shipments up to 25 pounds at 5 cents per package. The postal railway pay is shown to be about 1 cent per pound for distance of 200 miles. The fourth zone, excluding the rural zone, in the Bourne measure is from 600 miles to 1,000 miles. Obviously traffic destined to the fourth zone would tend to fall equally between the 600 miles and the 1,000 miles, or, in other words, would travel an average distance of 800 miles. We should thus have a cost to pay of 4 cents a pound in the way of railway pay, or 44 cents on the 11-pound package. Add to this 8 cents for collect and delivery and general expense and you have a rate of 52 cents. The rate fixed in the Bourne measure, however, is 79 cents, or fully 50 per cent more than the demonstrated cost. I append a table giving the rates as fixed in the Bourne bill and in parallel columns the rates based on actual cost. Excepting the first and the last zones and the first pound, I repeat that these rates are about 100 per cent higher than they need be. To this complaint some may say that the bill errs, if at all, only in the direction of extra caution. Let us grant this statement to be true. But, even if it be true, why does not the bill provide some tribunal with power, as experience dictates, to amend and change these rates to correspond with the cost of service and the interests of the traffic? Why is the Interstate Commerce Commission given the power to fix telegraph, telephone, express, and railroad rates, and the right of revision of these parcel-post rates denied the shipping public? If these rates are needlessly high all will agree that they should be lowered. If, in fact, they were too low all will agree they should be raised just as in the case of other transportation rates. Why does the bill deny this indispensible element and privilege if the Treasury is not to be endangered or the traffic itself destroyed?

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from Oregon can give some good reason? I can not.

PUBLIC SERVICE RATE-MAKING MOTIVE.

Obviously rigid law-made rates unadapted to the commercial requirement of the small shipment would kill more of the potential traffic than they would move. Congress, as I have stated, may very well lay down general principles of social conduct, but it is not a rate-making body, and even if the rates it made were momentarily adapted to secure the mobility of the shipment, the changed conditions from year to year would destroy this adaptation. Senators will perhaps agree that it is only once in a generation that noncurrent subjects can be reached by Congress, and if we once have law-made but unadapted rates without an administrative tribunal to revise them, the probability of their being reformed is not good within a generation. These rates ought, then, to be revised, as occasion requires, by men proficient in rate making, since the subject is beyond all question an administrative rather than a legislative one.

If the rates are administratively made by experts it can not be denied that the public-service motive determining their policy would be of momentous advantage to the public welfare. I mean no reflection on private investors when I suggest that there are some subjects, like the latter, to which class the small shipment belongs in transportation, as to which the private motive is ineffective and inadequate. You go to an express company and say "You moved 4,000,000 tons of express in 1909; your gross receipts were $132,000,000 and your profits $11,000,000. If you cut your rates in two this year the traffic will double in volume. Your profits may be slightly less, but the service to the public will be doubled." What would the express company do under such circumstances? It would do just what the average individual does, act on its normal private motive, retain the smaller traffic and the more assured or higher profits. But you go to a public-service institution, like the postal department, where you find the public motive. The postal system would say: "If cutting the rate in two will double the service, I will take my chances on the profits. If I lose 1 per cent in one pocket I shall be making 100 per cent in the other pocket, and since both pockets belong to the public it will be immensely the gainer." This is true, as exemplified in the history of the reductions of postal rates and the improvement of postal services throughout the world.

Even a small temporary deficit for experimental purposes would be fully justified, especially if the rate were elastic, and some administrative tribunal could thus promote the traffic and yet protect the treasury by rate adjustments from time to time. There is, indeed, a wide margin in which the public-service motive may economically operate to give increased service without substantially increased expense. This margin we know has been very wisely utilized in the transportation of the letter; and if we stop to remember that the small shipment or express traffic in the United States has scarcely reached its normal volume, it is apparent that the public-service motive may be very usefully employed in this field.

It is beyond question that the express companies constitute to-day an undoubted monopoly; and where monopoly obtains the rates may be made relatively high or low according as the private or the public motive may determine the degree of desirable service to be rendered the public. Some generations ago a British railway determined by experiment how best to graduate its passenger rates in order to secure the highest dividends. From month to month it adjusted and readjusted its passenger rates between the two extremes of 6 cents a mile and one-half cent a mile, just as one might adjust his field glass to secure the most distinct vision. The remarkable result these wide variations in the rate produced was this: That whether they used the lowest rate or the highest rate such was the ratio of response in the volume of traffic that the dividends did not differ by 2 per cent. Of course, they adopted the rate which produced the highest dividends and rejected the rate producing the most extensive public service—a rate of 3 cents a mile.

It is apparent from what we know of this subject that the small shipment, like the small man in society, is in need of all the favorable inducements and conditions which can be granted. The public-service motive is not the least, and may indeed be the very greatest requirement of the small shipment. Why should its efficacy and advantage be denied to it, then, when a Government is undertaking to provide a system for its transport? Why are expert rate makers, free to apply experimental methods and the wisdom of such experience under the auspices of a public-service motive, denied to this shipment when the Government is undertaking to provide the remedy?

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from Oregon can give some reason for this fundamental defect in his measure. I can not.

PAYING THE RAILROADS.

In 1908 the postal matter, excluding equipment, weighed 602,040 tons, which were carried on the average 620 miles, or 373,277,675 ton-miles, for which the railroads were paid $49,404,763, or at the rate of 13.2 cents per ton-mile (excluding the weight of equipment). In 1909 the express companies under these contracts paid the railroads $64,032,126 for hauling 4,556,296 tons an average of 200 miles, or 911,359,200 ton-miles, being at the rate of 7 cents a ton-mile, also excluding the weight of equipment. I need not say that in carrying parcels under the Bourne measure the railroads would be performing the same transportation service for the Government which they perform for the express companies. In a country like ours, where density of population is relatively low and transportation distances so very great, it goes without saying that the principal element of cost in the rates must be the money necessary to pay the railroads for their services. To be fair to the railroads, it must be confessed that they have made no demands or suggestions that they should be paid nearly twice as much for carrying a ton of parcels for the Government as, under their contracts, the express companies are now paying them for a ton of express parcels. I will not here enter into a discussion of the righteousness of the rate of pay made by the express companies to the railroads for such service, except to say that the railroads make no complaint that the express railway pay is not satisfactory.

As shown in the Bourne report, the Government under the present postal law for the carriage of letters, a different traffic from the carriage of parcels, will have to pay the railroads about 1 cent a pound for each 200 miles. From New York City to San Francisco this compensation to the railroads for a journey of approximately 3,600 miles would amount to about 18 cents a pound, while a parcel carried for the express company on the same train and receiving the same service from the railroad would cost the express companies for railway pay only about 7 cents a pound. Even considering all distances, the Bourne measure, by this utter inattention to the matter of parcel-railway pay, would oblige the Government to pay the railroads something over $13,000,000 for services as to which the railroads receive but $7,000,000 from the express companies. I repeat the statement that no railroad company of which I have heard has plotted or contrived to secure this result; and I also wish to say that the Senator from Oregon is not chargeable with any purpose to give the railroads nearly twice as much as they are satisfied with for like services from the express companies. At the same time the utter neglect of provision in his bill with regard to railway pay must work out this very result. Why should the Government pay two fares when a similar functionary, the express company, is paying but one? Why should the Government oblige itself to pay twice as much for transportation service as its supposed competitor under the bill?

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from Oregon can give some reason for this grave infirmity in his measure. I can not.

The express companies do enjoy other transportation facilities from the railroads, like depot and storage privileges, which have proven very serviceable—indeed, are indispensable to the express companies. Nothing is said whatever in the Bourne measure with regard to any of these, although equally as necessary to the Government. Indeed it may be said that the small shipment and parcel are treated in this bill as if they were only larger letters or postal cards, when in fact business experience and common sense plainly indicate that this small shipment requires all the facilities proper and usual with the express business.

Allow me to briefly recapitulate the essential elements in a parcel-post measure which are absolutely wanting in this:

The proper extension of the mailing privilege to include factory and farm products.

A maximum weight limit reasonably adapted to public needs.

The C. O. D. privilege and the return of hampers.

Provisions for the indemnification of shippers for losses.

Rates which the potential traffic can pay and move.

Elastic rate making, administrative readjustment of rates, and other service conditions, with an operative public-service motive.

A rate of pay to the railroads for carrying the parcel-post traffic not greater than the express railway pay.

What must be the verdict of Senators upon a measure which ignores such elementary essentials in the movement of the small shipment? For myself, I can only say that, endeavoring to conscientiously represent in this body the great State which has honored me, not to speak of the great agricultural interests, the shipping, and consuming people of the United States, I must protest with all the earnestness and vigor I possess against the enactment of such a mockery into the form of law. Consider, sirs, that our people have been asking for bread, and have waited its giving for 40 years. Who can say that this or similarly deficient measures will not provide them with the veriest stone?

Senators, of course, will recognize that no discussion has taken place in this body whatever on this grave and complex question. They will equally recognize, I am sure, that in the present exigency of the session proper discussion and deliberation can not be given to this subject. The people of the United States, while justly impatient at the neglect of Congress to provide them with this necessary agency, are not unwilling that the Senate should take such time as is actually necessary to work this legislation out in a satisfactory way. While, as I have said, no discussion has taken place in the Senate or can take place in an adequate way at this session, several days' discussion was given it in the House of Representatives. That body came to the conclusion that even further investigation was necessary in order to be fair to the subject and the people, and instead of passing immature, defective, and unconsidered legislation as a sop to the unwary, met this question in a manner at least creditable to their sincerity of purpose. The postal appropriation bill as it passed the House contains a provision that a committee of six—three Members of the House and three of the Senate—be appointed to report a bill on this subject at the December session. If the House of Representatives, with a week's discussion of the subject, felt that it was a patriotic duty to confess its inadequacy of information to deal intelligently with this subject, surely the Senate, with adequate discussion impossible under the circumstances, will be willing to do the public a like favor.

POSTAL EXPRESS.

While the House of Representatives, as stated, after several days' discussion, determined that sufficient consideration could not be given the subject in connection with the Post Office appropriation bill, one of the most efficient and painstaking committees of that body has given the matter its thorough consideration. I read from its report, House Report No. 598 such portions thereof as seem necessary to explain the judgment which that committee has reached:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 23713) to provide for the acquisition of the express companies' property so far as engaged in the express or parcel-post business, and the utilization thereof by the Postal Department, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The "parcel-post" function discharged by the express companies in the United States is a function almost uniformly discharged elsewhere by the postal departments. The bill now favorably reported provides for the similar postal discharge of the parcel function by our Government. All the vexed questions of parcel-post legislation now before Congress arise because the express-company method has failed to properly discharge this function or to render a service—

(a) Sufficiently extensive; they fail wholly to reach the country store or farm now reached by the postal system.

(b) Sufficiently economical; their rates are so high as to be prohibitive of most of the potential traffic.

(c) Sufficiently efficient; investigation has shown that their "overcharges" and "double collection of charges" constitute a serious public grievance, although meanwhile they have accumulated surplus profits of many times the capital devoted to the service.

(d) In failing to reach the farm, and thus permitting the vital necessaries to move at first cost directly to the consumers in the towns and cities, their inadequate service is a substantial cause of the high prices, about double what the farmer receives, for the table necessaries.

Hence, the widespread and persistent complaints of the rural and commercial interests, and the deep-seated feeling of the general public against these companies. These companies have simply entered upon the field in default of its proper occupancy by the postal agency, as in other countries, where such companies do not exist.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

Section 1 appropriates to the United States by condemnation the equipment and the express-railway contracts which are used in the conduct of the actual express business, and contains a proviso that no property is condemned not necessary to the conduct of the express function by the Government. It also requires the carriers to perform such services for the Government as have been customary with the express companies.

Section 2 directs the President to take possession of the properties condemned on July 1, 1913, and the Postmaster General to conduct the service, as a facility of, and in conjunction with, the postal service.

Section 3 gives the Postmaster General, subject to the approval of the President, power to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of the act.

Section 4 provides for the weighing of express matter during August and December, 1912, and April, 1913, as representative months for each carrier, and while the appropriated express-railway contracts remain in force, unless otherwise agreed, to pay such carriers the amount according to weight received by them under such contracts. By this means a large part of the burdensome transportation accounting of the express companies necessary to ascertain the railways' share of the specific express rates paid by the shippers would be eliminated.

Section 5 provides for the renewal of the express-railway contracts, at their termination, on terms to be agreed upon by the carrier and Postmaster General; and in case of failure to agree, gives the Interstate Commerce Commission power to declare the terms of such contracts.

Section 6 provides for the appraisement of the express property taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and section 7 provides for the payment of the final awards by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Section 8 defines the duties of the carriers under the act, the penalty for failure to perform them, and section 9 gives the Postmaster General power to acquire such equipment, etc., as may be necessary in the service.

POWER OF CONGRESS.

The power of Congress to deal with the subject, according to the method of the bill, is amply supported by the authorities:

"Contracts are property, and as such may be condemned and taken under the law of eminent domain." (10 Am. and Eng. Ency., p. 1089; Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 Howard (U. S.), 379; Nichols on Eminent Domain, sec. 315.)

"The United States possesses the power of eminent domain, which it may exercise to promote any of its constitutional powers." (10 Am. and Eng. Ency., p. 1051; Kohl v. U. S., 91 U. S., 367; 15 Cyc., pp. 564–565.)

"The United States may condemn interstate railways." (Nichols on Eminent Domain, sec. 23; Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U. S., 24; Monongahela case, 148 U. S., 431–432.)

"This power of condemnation may be exercised directly by the legislative branch. The only limitation is that just compensation shall be provided for." (10 Am. and Eng. Ency., p. 1068; Secombe v. Milwaukee, 23 Wall., 108.)

"In those cases where the condemnor is the sovereign the compensation need not be tendered or ascertained in advance of the taking. It is only necessary that adequate provision be made for compensation." (10 Am. and Eng. Ency., p. 1142, note 2; Nichols on Eminent Domain, sec. 263; Sweet v. Rechel, 159 U. S., 380; Williams v. Parker, 188 U. S., 491.)

"The owner of property condemned by the United States is not entitled to a jury, but commissioners may determine the amount of compensation, etc." (Nichols on Eminent Domain, secs. 302, 306; U. S. v. Jones, 109 U. S., 513, 569; 169 U. S., 567; 11 Peters, 420, 571; 148 U. S., 312, 327.)

It is generally admitted that the problem before the country is how to get these vital necessaries direct from the producer to the consumer at something like the price at which they are produced. A study of these questions develops the fact that a method of relief requires the coincidence of two conditions: (a) A transportation condition permitting the economical movement, direct from the rural producer to the consumer, of (b) articles in quantities to suit the consumer's needs, i. e., retail, not wholesale, quantities.

The direct transportation in mind is a linking up of the rural delivery structure with the urban delivery plants of the express companies, and of both with the railways. The difficulty now lies in the absence of a connected transportation conduit, which will receive the small shipment at the farm and convey it, like a letter, direct to the consumer. It must be obvious that if these agencies are so linked as to move the retail shipment a solution of the parcel-post problem will be obtained, and on terms, too, that will remove the objections of the local merchant. No one fears a just express rate and improved express service that will, moreover, reach the merchant and farmer in the country.

The report, then, refers to comparative express rates of different countries and the paucity of the express traffic here, giving the tables inserted in a former part of this address. It then proceeds as follows:

REDUCTION OF RATES.

An inspection of the reports of the companies to the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1910 shows gross revenues of $146,116,318, out of which the railroads received $69,917,561, while $61,690,473 was paid for express-operating expenses; $1,126,726 taxes; leaving $13,392,080 in profits, on an investment in the business of $15,453,947, of which the following are the items:

Materials and supplies	332,494
Advance payments on contracts	5,685,833
Total	15,453,947

There is an additional item of "expenditures for real property" of $15,890,048, much of which consists of city office buildings, devoted only partially to the service.

The thirteen millions of profits could be applied under postal auspices to reducing the rates. So, also, it is believed, could more than one-half of the express-operating expense. Investigation shows that of some 22 acts of transportation attention devoted to the small shipment by the railway and express company, no less than 15 such acts are replaced by the postage stamp, with like packages under postal methods. Besides this egregious waste in transportation accounting it is manifest that the multiplication of plants, officers, and agents by the different companies in the towns and cities would permit of elimination through already existing postal facilities, not to speak of 13 systems of overhead charges by as many express companies. When the express plants have been merged in the postal system these savings would, it is estimated, permit of reductions on the rates for packages below 10 pounds of from one-half to two-thirds, and reductions of one-third generally.

COST OF ACQUISITION.

The reports of the express companies to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year 1910 give the following statement of their assets:

General balance-sheet statement as of June 30, 1910 and 1909.

ASSETS.

Items.	Grand total.
Expenditures for real property	$15,890,048.77	$14,999,211.94
Stocks owned	50,598,202.90	40,879,647.22
Funded debt owned	51,513,022.08	45,955,672.54
Other permanent investments	14,220,092.90	26,017,709.11
Cash and current assets	45,421,184.34	33,682,608.88
Materials and supplies	332,494.76	138,210.78
Sinking, insurance, and other funds	140,384.34	128,491.83
Advance payments on contracts	5,685,733.34	5,836,666.67
Franchises, good will, etc	10,916,445.46	10,916,703.07
Other assets	547,955.22	266,965.33
Profit and loss	8,752.63	91,129.58
Total assets	204,710,036.91	186,227,380.54

Of these items only the following are to be considered as involved at all in the property to be acquired under the bill (1910):

(1) Expenditures for real property	$15,890,048.77
(2) Expenditures for equipment	9,435,620.17
(3) Materials and supplies	332,494.76
(4) Advance payments on contracts	5,685,833.34
(5) Franchises, good will, etc	10,916,445.46

The first item, real property, it is not thought will be necessary to the postal operation of the service; and as mere office buildings, the Postmaster General is directed to refuse to take them by the bill.

The last, the fifth item, franchises and good will, is subject to the following reflections: The express companies do not have any franchises. A franchise is a grant of some special and exclusive privilege by the State or Government; e. g., the right to lay gas or water mains beneath or above the streets, street railways, or ferries, or bridges. No such franchises or grants of any kind are possessed by any of the companies. With respect to the so-called "good will," of what does it consist? It can not, under our fundamental law, validly consist of the transportation rate and facilities extended to the express company by the carrier, because all shippers are legally entitled to the same treatment from the carrier under the Federal and the common law. But even if "good will" existed as a legal fact, the claimant does not appear to be entitled to be paid for it under the laws of eminent domain. (Laflin v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 33 Fed. R., 415; 15 Cyc., p. 646.)

It is believed that it is the item "advance payments on contracts" alone which presents the character of artificial value with anything in the nature of a claim. This $5,000,000 was exacted by the railways and paid by the express companies in violation of the public policy of the law with respect to carriers for centuries. Ought it be repaid to the express companies by the Government, consisting as it did of the price of an offense against the policy of its laws? This is at last a judicial question upon which the courts alone can pass; but it should be added that it involves a value practically inconsiderable when compared with the great value and indispensable importance of the contracts to the public service.

The cost of the acquisition will probably embrace the following items:

Materials and supplies	332,494
Expenditures for real property (one-third)	5,296,647
Total	15,064,761

Even if the "advance payments on contracts" be added, the total cost would be a little less than $21,000,000.

ADVANTAGES OF THE EXPRESS-RAILROAD CONTRACTS.

The advantages to the Postal Department of these express-railroad contracts is shown in a single statement. In 1908 the postal matter, excluding equipment, weighed 602,040 tons, which were carried on the average 620 miles, or 373,277,675 ton-miles; for which the railroads were paid $49,404,763, or at the rate of 13.2 cents per ton-mile. In 1909 the express companies, under these contracts, paid the railroads $64,032,126 for hauling 4,556,296 tons an average of 200 miles, or 911,359,200 ton-miles, being at the rate of 7 cents a ton-mile, also excluding equipment. It is hard to see how the post office could compete with the express companies without these contracts while paying nearly twice as much to the railways on packages of like weight.

Another equally great value that would go with the contracts would be the innumerable advantages of a going concern, a practical modus operandi, having nearly all the necessary adjustments to business habits and human relations already in working order.

Outside of the costly waste to the public involved in maintaining two services there are very direct reasons why the express contract should be secured. The postal system requires them in order to obtain:

(a) The declension in express-railway pay, necessary for a desirable zone system.

(b) The numerous "depot" and storage privileges accorded the express companies by the railways.

(c) Conservation of structural factors in the express institution of intrinsically serviceable character.

(d) To avoid controversies and, perhaps, serious mistakes with the railways incident to entirely new relations.

PURCHASING THE EXPRESS COMPANIES.

Hardly any person will question the wisdom of securing such advantages; and certainly no one who faces the package-transport question seriously will deny the advantages themselves. The depot privileges of the express company are simply indispensable to an efficient and economical administration of the function. If the postal system has to provide itself with these facilities by rent or purchase, it would find the cost to be much greater than the purchase of the express contracts. But it is the history of the express company which gives the real trouble here. The people do not object to paying for what they require. It is the conviction that express capital does not represent any actual investment, but, such as it is, is made up of accumulated excess profits in the past. The moral antagonism to paying them for that which they have unrighteously taken from the people in excessive profits is the root of the opposition. It is the same feeling which many entertained toward paying for the slaves' emancipation, but we know now that the cheapest way for the emancipator, and the best way for both slave and master would have been to recognize the commercial facts by fair payment.

PARCEL POST AND REGULATION.

Testimony before the committee was to the effect that regulation of the express rates could not be made effective because of the very small margin of the rate, less than 7 per cent in 1911, which is profit; that the service could not be sufficiently economically done by the railways, even if required, because of their transportation practices, especially their accounting, and the fact that compelling each railroad to perform the service would be multiplying the 13 express companies into many more than 900, the number of independent railroads, with the concomitant waste of accounting relations relatively aggravated.

The suggestion is made that the Government establish an independent parcel post. With one already existing, in working order, it seems useless to establish another and oblige the public to pay the cost of maintaining both. Moreover, it is submitted that it would be very unwise, unless paramount necessity so dictated, to force a new system upon the business interests of the country, and, whether with good or ill reason, a system it has learned to fear. To suddenly force a revolutionary system of rates, without study or preparation, is a circumstance well calculated to frighten business, even if, as a matter of fact, as now proposed, such rates are so high as to effectually prevent the intended relief. Conservative counsel would seem to suggest that no such unnecessary and drastic proceeding be taken.

RATE MAKING.

The rate-making function can not be in Congress or any of its committees. General principles of social action the Congress is constituted to deal with, but the making of specific rates is alien to its function. Moreover, a law-made rate would be practically unalterable. About once in a generation can Congress act on a given subject, while these rates might require frequent readjustments in such a period, in the interest of traffic mobility, if not the railway pay. There would have to be an administrative tribunal to fix such rates in an initiatory way, with an appeal by the public and the railway to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and this tribunal the bill supplies. In this way the necessary elasticity—that is, adaptability—of the rate to transportation conditions might be secured.

CONCLUSIONS.

(1) The express companies constitute in fact the "parcel post" of the United States, but—

(2) Because of their prohibitive rates and nonextension to rural points their service is inadequate.

(3) The service is a natural part of the postal function and should be merged in the postal organization.

(4) The contracts and equipment of such companies are essential to an economical and efficient service by the postal department.

(5) That the extension of such service to the country will operate to substantially reduce the prevailing high prices of the vital necessaries.

(6) The rates should be administratively, not legislatively, made in order to move the potential traffic and protect the Treasury.

(7) This measure offers a full solution of the small shipment problem and allays, in place of exciting, the apprehensions of the retail merchants of the country.

Mr. President, this is the decision reached by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House on the principles of what has become known as the postal express as embodied in the Goeke bill. On February 26, 1912, I introduced a similar bill in the Senate. Some Senators may not know its full scope and purpose, and some Senators may have wondered why they have not heard more from it since its introduction, but I do not believe there is a Senator here but that some, if not many, of his constituents know its full scope and purpose and who has not received from them favorable petitions and letters. I do not feel that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have been altogether fair in their consideration of this subject, and I will say frankly that when I introduced Senate bill 5474 it was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and my reason for having it so referred was the feeling that it would receive a fairer and more unbiased consideration at the hands of that committee. The distinguished chairman of that committee asked me if I had any objection to the bill being withdrawn from that committee and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Following this the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads approached me and asked if I would not be willing to have the bill recalled from the Committee on Interstate Commerce and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, with the assurance that it would receive fair and earnest consideration at the hands of that committee according to the importance of the proposed legislation embodied in the bill. However the committee may feel, I believe the character and number of its supporters speak for its importance, and I feel that it received scant consideration at their hands. After quite a length of time and a number of delays, we only succeeded in getting a hearing for one evening before the committee, at which three members were present, and were interrupted by a person who presented an entirely different and separate proposition before some of those who had come long distances and were well prepared to argue the merits of the bill were given a chance to do so. From that time on the author of the bill was not approached or considered in any way by the committee until July 18, which leads him to think that the committee has not been open minded or keenly desirous of formulating a system of parcel post for the single purpose of giving to the public the best possible service to which they are entitled.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GARDNER. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask the Senator whether he refers to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate?

Mr. GARDNER. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am a member of that committee, and one who has attended quite consistently its deliberations, and I feel that the statement of the Senator is ungenerous at least. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for months have deliberated most conscientiously and earnestly on the parcel-post proposition. They have had very many hearings, and at those hearings there have been present a goodly number of men from all walks of life who are interested in the subject, including the Postmaster General, the Assistant Postmasters General, and members of the Post Office Committee. In justice to that committee, or the work of that committee, I desire to say that in the measure reported here to-day they have evolved a bill that is entitled at least to the very serious consideration of the people of the United States and of the Senate. It may not encompass all that is desirable, but at least it is a long step in the direction of that which I believe the people desire and demand, and it will result, to my mind, in infinite good.

I think the Senator will realize that the inauguration of a parcel post is for us at least a radical step, although I will admit it is an old institution in countries like Germany, Switzerland, and many others. Of course, the Senator realizes that it would be impossible to compare the United States with a country such as Switzerland, a small, compact Republic. Probably the Swiss system is the best; it is better at least than many others; it is a very complete and practical system, and so is that of Germany; but the conditions are very widely different there from those in this country, both as to general cost of maintenance and transportation, and then the question of the compactness of the country puts us largely at a disadvantage.

But I rose simply to say, with reference to the suggestion that the hearings were not liberal and fair, that I feel that is an unjust and ungenerous criticism.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. President, I simply want to remind the Senator that he was not present at the hearing given upon this proposition.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was not present at that particular time.

Mr. GARDNER. That was the statement I made, and that is the statement I make now.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was not present at all of the hearings, but I have been an active and industrious member of that committee.

Mr. GARDNER. That was the meeting I was talking about, and not some other.

Mr. President, the acquisition of the express companies of the United States as going concerns would carry with it the many factors of value in their operating structures. It would carry with it not only the seven elements pointed out by Dr. Henry and Mr. Hampton as incidents and privileges indispensable to the movement of the small shipment for the purposes of commerce and otherwise, but also a full system of regulations found necessary by these companies to the adjustment of the traffic in its various relations to the needs of society. Very many of these regulations, absolutely necessary to the conduct of the business of moving the small shipment, are perhaps unknown to a single Member of this Congress. We could not write them all into our statute under such circumstances, while the acquisition of the express plants would bring them to us with trained men as well, who understand this occupation and would be able to continue its operation without disturbance to the business public.

I wish to confirm what the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House has so lucidly stated in its report favoring the establishment of a "postal express." The express company is our "parcel post." It wants the "public service motive," which I have previously discussed; it wants also extension of its service to the country through the rural-delivery structure, as previously stated. It also wants its rates, which are now prohibitive, rendered normal and such as to move the potential traffic. It is true the express companies are helpless in the situation, either to extend their service to the country or to bring their rates down to normal.

The causes for this I have, perhaps, already discussed as exhaustively as the Senate cares to hear. I will only summarize the arguments by stating that the Government alone, through its rural-delivery organization, already paid for, and needing only some inconsiderable improvement, can supply the link necessary to articulate the town and the railways with the farm. This rural delivery is costing it some $40,000,000 a year, and it would be absurd to ask the express companies to duplicate that structure, now waiting with empty wagons to receive the traffic. The methods of the express company business, namely, its egregious "transportation accounting" and the quadruplication of offices and agencies in the larger towns and cities, swallow up neary one-half of the average express charge. These economic wastes would be eliminated by the postal system, which already is maintaining for letter purposes an adequate structure for the larger service, paid for and ready to discharge the acts of attention necessary to the small shipment as well. On the branch lines of the railroads and in all distributing points the express and postal personnel are duplicated, and the wastes of duplication susceptible of elimination under postal auspices constitute the scandal of transportation with respect to this small shipment.

Within a year of the acquisition of these plants their merger into the postal organization could be rendered complete, and with them would go all the elements of value in express practice and organization. The express rates are now said to number 600,000,000, counting place to place, rates. These would certainly give place to a new rate structure, that might, indeed, be printed on a single page. All the class-freight traffic of the Prussian railway system, amounting in volume to about one-half of that in the United States, is now carried upon such a rate sheet. While I do not have the assurance, which administrative experience only can give in such matters, I would suggest that in a country as large as ours some 30 zones would be necessary to commercially adapt the rates to the distances the articles of shipment might need to go.

In this connection I may say that it has been shown under the so-called Talcott law in transportation economics, referred to and demonstrated by Mr. LEWIS in his study on this subject, that the cost of transportation tends to double only as the distance of shipment quadruples. That is, that the cost of service does not increase arithmetically with the distance, but increases in proportion to the square root. Thus, if a fair charge for a 5-pound parcel for 25 miles, the square root of which is 5, was 10 cents, the charge would be 20 cents for 100 miles, the square root of which is 10. Mr. LEWIS has found that this square-root declension practically ceases in the freight traffic at 900 miles, whence for greater distances the cost of service practically represents a horizontal or level progression with increasing distances. I am now inserting in my address the rate table compiled by him, showing average express rates for the distances and weights given, as compared with the rates which would be feasible under the system of postal express proposed and as also compared with the rates for 5 and 10 pound parcels under the Bourne bill. The table shows the special loadings included for postal general expense and also for collect and delivery in the tentative rate for each of the shipments. The loading for railway transportation pay represents the actual amounts paid by the express companies to the railways on the aggregate of their traffic. This means that if a like amount of traffic were carried on the rates for postal express in the subjoined table that is carried by the express companies the pay to the railways would not change. In short, the only question as to the validity of the tentative postal-express rates given in the table can only relate to the sufficiency of the loadings assigned for collect and delivery and for general expense, which, however, agree with the estimates of the Postal Department as quoted in the Bourne report.

The recent revision of the express company rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission has reduced such rates about one-third to two-fifths, and in some instances to one-half, of the rates now prevailing as given in table on following page.

"C. & D." equals "collect and delivery," and "G. E." equals "general expense" loadings.

Comparing the Bourne rates with the postal-express rates, it is apparent that the Bourne rates are nearly uniformly about twice as high as they need to be under a system of postal express. Indeed, the Bourne rates up to 2 pounds are not near as low as the rates now granted by the express companies if the rates are prepaid. Under the Bourne bill the rates have to be prepaid, there being no C. O. D. privilege. The express companies will now carry to any point in the United States, if the rate is prepaid, at 10 cents for the first pound and 8 cents for each additional pound, third-class mail matter, up to a 4-pound limit. I say that the Bourne rates are shown to be nearly twice as high as the feasible "postal-express" rates need be by the most careful and painstaking investigation this subject has ever received. But one can easily understand why the Bourne rates should be so high when the bill by its silence on the question of railway pay for the transportation of the parcel commits the Government to paying the railways nearly twice as much for the service as the express company pays for the same service.

Mr. President, if there are those here who consider that taking over the express plants and merging them in the postal system looks "too big" an undertaking, I wish to say that it is only a superficial view of the subject which could give that feeling. As a matter of fact, the legislative or even administrative construction of a parcel-post system worthy of the name is an undertaking so replete with difficulty, so taxing in its complexity, and so doubtful in its outcome that the transfer of the parcel-express function to the postal system as a task of statesmanship is literally simple and trivial in the comparison. If we take over the express plants, we know what we have to do. It is merely to correct the deficiencies in their structures by proper articulation with the town and railroad and with the country through the rural delivery, together with a proper reduction of their prohibitive charges through the simplification of postal methods. In this way we should easily convert what is now the scandal of transportation the world over, the inefficient express company, into a parcel-post system that would defy comparison with similar agencies throughout the world.

Mr. President, I will discuss briefly the question of what we would have to pay for the acquisition of the express plants. First, it is proper to suggest that the danger of having to pay for anything but actual values is removed. There are two values which may be considered in condemnation cases, one is the physical value of the property and the other is the franchise value, if any is connected with its use. The express companies of the United States have no franchises. A franchise is some exclusive privilege or right granted by the sovereign State or the Nation. No express company has had granted to it any such right. It has been shown by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House that the probable cost of acquisition would not exceed $21,000,000 under any circumstances. If there is any Member of the Senate that feels that these figures may be increased to thirty or forty or even fifty million dollars, all of which he will find unsustained upon investigation, let me assure him that even such price would be an extravagant bargain in favor of the Government. Consider, sirs, that the express companies are collecting this year from the American public, for carrying a traffic their prohibitive rates have reduced by one-half, not less than $170,000,000. Consider that the people are paying, out of this sum, at least $70,000,000 more than they would have to pay under postal management. Consider that under the influence of normal rates and an extension of the agency to the farm the traffic itself would quadruple in a brief time, and then consider how utterly trivial the ten or fifteen or twenty million dollars excessive price for the express plants would be compared with the hundreds of millions of dollars of excessive rates which may have to be paid those intruders in transportation, and the hundreds of millions of dollars of potential traffic now destroyed by their practices, which is yet so necessary to the farmers and consumers of the country.

Mr. President, I am not alone in the view I take of the necessities of this subject. The Committee of the House of Representatives on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not alone in the view it takes. The House of Representatives, in asking for a joint committee of the House and Senate to consider this proposition to eliminate the express companies, is not alone in the view it has taken. The great Democratic convention which recently assembled at Baltimore has declared in its platform for the establishment of a system of "postal express," and it is not alone in the views it took.

Mr. President, the country is actually demanding that Congress give adequate attention to this subject, and is already in grave fear that a mere mockery of a remedy may be enacted. It knows the grave danger in which insufficient attention and study on our part may place this whole subject, and accordingly has gone into a detail with respect to it which I will now ask the Senate to hear.

In November of last year I attended the annual session of the National Grange in Columbus, Ohio, and was present during the parcel post discussion, and witnessed the unanimous indorsement of the Lewis postal express idea, the principal features of which are contained in the so-called postal express bill.

In December I attended the annual meeting of the Maine State Grange, and in February the meeting of the New York State Grange, and in both instances heard the discussion and action of the National Grange unqualifiedly indorsed. Simultaneously with these meetings other State granges were meeting and taking similar action, and since I have been here in Washington I have met in conference the representatives of many other farm organizations, notably the Farmers' Union. During the year I have been in constant touch with the farm organization leaders in all parts of the country. I am myself a farmer and have all my life been identified with the farm and farm organizations, and am at present the president of the Conference of Progressive State Granges having organizations in a dozen States and affiliated with organizations in almost every State in the Union. In view of these facts I think I can safely claim that no Senator is to-day in so close touch with the agricultural people as myself, and, Mr. President, they never were more deeply in earnest than they are over this question or knew so definitely what they wanted as they do at the present time. They want a postal express, and will be satisfied with nothing less. They want the legislation embodied in what is known as the Lewis plan and which is before this body in Senate bill 5474.

Mr. President, the farmers do not want the bill because I introduced it. I introduced it because the farmers wanted it, because their most representative organizations made it perfectly clear what it was they wanted, and because my personal study of the subject convinced me absolutely that they were right in wanting it, and, being right, should stand by their convictions, and after all these years of weary waiting insist upon Congress enacting legislation that would actually produce the results desired.

If the Senators from Pennsylvania have kept in close touch with the farmers of their great State they can tell you that the Pennsylvania Grange has been conducting a campaign of education for a postal express continuously since the early summer of last year. Not an issue of their State organ but what has had an able article on the subject. Other States have followed suit, and, in order that the Senate may fully understand the earnestness and unity of this farmers' movement for a postal express, I submit quotations from the official grange reports. The standing committee on postal reform of the National Grange in its report, among other things, said:

There are at the present time about a score of bills providing for varying forms of parcel-post service now pending at Washington, and it is not an easy task for this body to select one specific bill and focus its attention upon that. There are clearly two possible courses of action by this body which must herewith be considered: (1) To take a firm stand at this session in favor of genuine progressive parcel-post legislation and demand its speedy enactment by Congress without attempting to establish a positive grange position on any one specific bill out of the score in question; (2) to endeavor to point to one particular bill and demand specific action thereon as the grange position on the parcel-post question.

The first proposition is open at once to commendation and criticism. With so many bills pending, all aimed toward the same end, it may be argued that the grange policy should be sufficiently flexible to admit of a readjustment to such condition as our legislative committee may find as the situation shapes itself, and also to admit of the joining of forces with other organizations in a great forward movement for parcel post as the congressional season advances. This idea is open to a serious criticism, however. When the general subject of parcel post is put up to a Senator or Congressman in question form he is almost sure to reply with a smile or by a form letter, "Certainly I am in favor of parcel post, and the matter will have my most earnest consideration," leaving the questioner just about as well informed as he was before. If a distinct bill is to be submitted, then the statesman can be pinned down to the specific question and must give an answer that amounts to something.

The second proposition has the advantage already referred to of permitting the specific and definite pledges of Members of Congress, with the consequent increased likelihood of favorable action, but is in turn open to the objection that if this body be definitely committed to any one bill, or system of parcel post, then it might be rendered difficult for our legislative committee to adjust to new conditions that might arise in the matter or to arrange for effective cooperative effort with other organizations similarly interested with our own in the parcel-post fight.

As between these two propositions your committee is inclined to feel that the resolution offered to this body by the master of the Maryland State Grange presents the most effective position this session can take on the parcel-post question, and we therefore recommend the indorsement of that resolution, which was as follows:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the National Grange, in forty-fifth annual session assembled, the system of postal express as prepared by Congressman LEWIS, of Maryland, offers a thorough solution of the parcel-post measure, and that we hereby indorse the same and urge its passage. This indorsement is not intended that we shall abandon the position formerly taken by the National Grange on the parcel-post question."

We recommend that this matter shall be given early consideration by our legislative committee, and especially urge that said committee shall, as soon as practicable, prepare and submit to the State granges at least an outline of the most effective means to be set in motion in the respective State granges, to the end that the great parcel-post fight of the winter may be instantly and actively started in every grange State.

We therefore recommend such early consideration of this matter by our legislative committee as shall make possible a conference with the parties in question, and that at such conference, and in all future like opportunities, the position of the National Grange shall be emphatically that of participation in any combined forward movement for parcel post that it is possible to make with any or all other organizations likewise interested in this vitally important subject.

This report was signed by all members of the committee and unanimously adopted. The chairman of the committee was the master of the Massachusetts State Grange, an organization having 30,000 members in that State. But the National Grange's consideration of what it proposed to make its paramount issue for legislation in this Congress did not rest here. It was brought up again by the committee on cooperation, one of the most important of the standing committees of the organization, of which the master of the Pennsylvania State Grange—well known to many Senators here as an exceptionally able man—was chairman. From this report I quote:

We recognize that the high cost of living in the country is largely due to a lack of cooperation between the producers and the consumers. Neither of these classes are to blame for this condition directly, yet in a reflex manner, by an apathetic consideration of legislation, the general public is blamable for existing economic conditions. It should be the purpose of this great organization to adopt as legislative principles and to work for the construction of laws that will prevent the inflation of corporate holdings, which we believe to be the most serious menace to our national prosperity, and to work for fair and equitable tariff legislation which will deny special privileges in trade to those business institutions which thrive only upon the opportunities given them through unjust laws.

The existence of business parasites is a hindrance to cooperation, and we would point out that the most dangerous economic parasite with which the people of the country have to contend, and especially the farmer, is the express company. Our tribute to it, as well as to those other concerns which are probably important on their merits but dangerous in their inflated conditions, is a tax which should not be imposed and which serves to defeat the best interests of the people. Therefore we recommend, as one of the great reforms necessary for the successful development of cooperation, that this body indorse the plan of postal express now pending before Congress, being a bill presented by DAVID J. LEWIS, Member of Congress from the sixth district of Maryland, and known as the Lewis bill.

This thought opens up the subject of distribution. Poor methods of distribution are a hindrance to successful cooperation. The postal-express plan, in our judgment, will assist in more efficient distribution, inasmuch as it will create an articulation heretofore denied between all sections of the country, which will in turn serve to force individuals and corporations dealing in the necessaries of life to modernize their methods of handling the products of the farm. In many of our great cities we find the methods of distribution antiquated and really obsolete.

It should be the desire of the farmer to deal directly with those who consume what he raises, and to this end it is wise, in our judgment, to establish relations with other organized classes. Organized labor is prepared to meet us halfway. We would urge that the relations between the organized farmer, who is a producer, and organized labor, also a producer, be encouraged.

In my own State the grange has a membership of 1 in every 11 of the total population. There are 500 local organizations and a county organization in every county in the State. With hardly an exception, petitions have been filed by me or my colleague from every one of these local organizations asking for the passage of the postal-express bill; and at the spring meeting of the executive committee the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas it is our positive conviction that the most effective way to secure the legislation desired by farmers and indorsed by the grange is to elect to office only those who are pledged to support and work for grange measures: Therefore

Resolved by the executive committee of the Maine State Grange in regular meeting assembled, That the secretary be, and is hereby, instructed to send the following appeal to the subordinate granges of the State:

TO THE PATRONS OF MAINE.

Patrons, this is your opportunity. In the coming election each of you has an undivided responsibility to see to it that no one gets the farmer vote who does not stand squarely for the grange demands. You owe not the smallest measure of support to the candidate who says to you, "I desire to go through the campaign unpledged." The man who will not tell the voters where he stands on the great questions which are before the people in plain and unmistakable terms is not worthy of your support. No candidate for United States Senator or Congressman should receive your support unless pledged to the passage of the Gardner postal-express bill, the passage of the Haugen oleomargarine bill, in favor of the furtherance of popular government, and opposed to the Aldrich money scheme. No candidate for reelection should receive your support unless his record is straight on these measures.

Patrons, the responsibility is squarely up to each and every one. He who fails to do his duty and go to the polls and vote for the candidate, regardless of party, who stands most openly and fearlessly for grange measures has no right to complain of conditions.

Executive Committee Maine State Grange.

Passing from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast 12,000 grangers of Oregon by petition to the House of Representatives urged their Representatives to vote for the passage of the similar measure, which had just been favorably reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Goeke bill.

In the adjoining State of Washington, the home State of the chairman of the executive committee of the farmers' national committee on postal reform, the 20,000 members of the State grange and the 10,000 members of the Farmers' Union are united in their demand for a "postal express." The Washington State Grange has just held its annual session (June 4–7), and I submit the parcel-post section of the master's annual address:

POSTAL EXPRESS—A REAL PARCEL POST.

For 20 years the grange has urged on Congress the enactment of legislation that would place the United States at least on a level with the other leading nations in an efficient parcel-post service. But as Postmaster General John Wanamaker said years ago, four big giants blocked the way. The big express companies said no, and that settled it. The grange was powerless to marshal the farmers in their might as long as the nation was in the control of the machine reactionaries. But two years ago the progressive granges determined to appeal to the farmers generally to unite for the parcel-post fight and join with them in organizing the farmers' national committee on postal reform. Later they took the lead in organizing the Postal Express Federation, and the battle for a real parcel post is now on in earnest. Twenty years ago we were ready to take any parcel post Congress would give us, but our well-paid Senators and Congressmen have ignored the subject year after year and, except for a few notable exceptions, know less about the matter than thousands of our members. Now we do not propose to wait any longer, but intend to have, and that right speedily, the best parcel-post service in the world, or a new set of Senators and Congressmen. Instead of allowing the express companies longer to block the way, we propose to wipe them off the face of the earth, take over their equipment and working staff, and consolidate all the express companies into one perfect postal-express system and extend the service to the farmers through the rural delivery. We want no more 8 cents per pound flat rate and 11 pounds limit. We want a graduated rate and a weight limit of at least 33 pounds—110 pounds, the same as Germany, would be better.

The committee on postal improvement will treat this matter fully, and I bespeak your most careful consideration of the matter. To secure a postal express is our paramount issue in national legislation, and no candidate should be elected to Congress who does not stand by the grange in this great reform. There should be posted in every grange the names of those Senators and Congressmen who oppose the grange postal express bill in one column, and in another the names of those who support it and fight with us. Let our motto be, Put no one on guard in Congress who does not ring true, but let us also see to it that those Senators and Congressmen who do stand steadfast and fight on our side are rewarded by the true appreciation of a strong, loyal support.

Mr. President, I could make similar quotations from many other States, but I have, I believe, submitted enough to show that the farmer movement for a postal express is not one that has been lightly undertaken, but is founded on deep conviction, which has taken and is taking strong hold on the rural people. They will not be satisfied with halfway measures. They expect, at the very least, that this Congress will give them a modern, up-to-date postal-express service, which means a better and more complete system than that which the Imperial German Parliament gave to the German people a quarter of a century ago—a service which will do for the American farmer and American industry what that service has done for the German farmer and German industry.

In the first half of the nineteenth century Great Britain was the one great commercial power of Europe, with a world-wide trade. It was practically without a rival, but in the last half century, with giant strides Germany forged to the front to contest with Great Britain her supremacy in the world's commerce. In many lines she has surpassed Great Britain and to-day stands the leader without a peer in many important industries. The commercial rise and the industrial achievements of the German Empire deservedly command the admiration of the world, and the causes therefor are the study of the thoughtful statesmen of every country. Many causes contributed to this phenomenal industrial growth, but the great underlying cause was that the statesmen of Germany made the common welfare of the German people the guiding principle of their actions. But in no way, Mr. President, have the statesmen of Germany shown a higher degree of statesmanship or shown their devotion to the public welfare, in conserving the prosperity of agriculture, in insuring a low cost of living to the people of the Empire, and in safeguarding the rights of the people than in the establishment of a postal express and providing for the fullest and freest possible exchange of commodities between producer and consumer. As summarizing in a brief but comprehensive way what the postal express has done for Germany I quote from an article written by Hon. J. C. Monaghan, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, for Dun's Review of February 24, 1906, and which can be found in full in Senate Document No. 379:

THE PARCEL-POST SYSTEM OF GERMANY.

[Written for Dunn's Review of Feb. 24, 1906, by Hon. J. C. Monaghan, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.]

Among the greatest needs of the present day is a better development of the means of distribution. Much of the overproduction, of which so many complaints are heard, is simply due to lack of distribution. Among the modern methods of distributing merchandise the post holds a rank scarcely dreamed of in the days of the first American Postmaster General, Benjamin Franklin. Even his genius hardly foresaw the day when the packages of the merchant and tradesman would be carried by the postman. The best example of a successful parcel-post system to enable a business man to form a just idea of it is the German system, which the writer saw in operation for 12 years. The gigantic genius that forged and welded the fragments of the Empire into one cohesive mass—Bismarck—did as much as anyone to give the Empire a postal system so successful that it excites envy and emulation. In a year, 1903, it netted the Empire nearly $15,000,000 over and above all expenditures, while the American service showed a deficit of $4,356,000.

WELDING THE CITIES TO THE FARMS.

Not the least successful branch of the system—certainly not the least useful part—is that which deals with parcels or packages of all kinds of products, from those of the farm or ranch to those of the factory or store. From the huge streams of wares that flow through the post offices of Berlin, Hamburg, and the larger towns and cities, as well as the tiny rivulets of articles that are put into the parcel post in remote Tyrolese hamlets and in thousands of country offices, is formed a veritable ocean or sea of traffic. The yellow wagons of the Empire or the royal wagons of Kingdoms like Wurttemberg and Bavaria that have held on to their separate postal rights, wind their way in and out of the highways and byways of the entire Empire, picking up and laying down wares. Careful, sensible, systematic, and businesslike are the only words that will properly describe this wonderful system and its successful work.

CHARGES THAT MAKE BUSINESS GROW.

The one vital factor in a system of this kind is the charge. If it is too high it defeats the object at which it aims—public convenience. In all its efforts to secure efficiency the German Empire has always aimed at a system such as would secure that result at a moderate cost. Its success has been fairly phenomenal, for its charges have been moderate, the service the very acme of efficiency. As already suggested, distance and weight form the factors in the problem of price for the service. The distance charges are determined by zones, the first zone or circle within which the lowest price is paid being 10 geographical miles from the post office as a center; the second zone all points beyond the 10-mile limit, but within 20 miles; the third, the points between the 20 and a 50 mile circle; the fourth, between 50 and 100; the fifth, between 100 and 150; the sixth and last, all points in the Empire beyond a circle 150 miles from the post office or center.

CHEAP AND QUICK TRANSPORTATION MAKES FOR GENERAL PROSPERITY.

How much the parcel post has meant in the past, how much it means now, and how much it is to mean in the Empire's marvelous development will never be known till some German Mulhall makes its work the subject of a brilliant special monograph. From the far-off shores of Heligoland and the North Sea fishing villages the products of the deep are collected, carried across a large part of the Continent, and delivered, the service extending to the confines of Bohemia, or even to Austria and Hungary, for there is a postal arrangement between the two Empires that admits all the benefits of the one to the citizens of the other. From the seaport cities come the bananas, oranges, lemons, pineapples, cocoanuts, the rich spices of the East, the finer fibers and textiles of Persia, India, China, and Japan; from Switzerland come the rich dairy products and marvelous honey gathered from its mountain flowers, a honey as rich as that of Hymettus; from the Rhine lands the wines are sent in baskets far beyond where the vine will grow; out of the south, by Botzen, on the hills near Innsbruck, and along Lake Garda go fruits and flowers to Berlin and Breslau, Konigsberg, Danzig, and Stettin.

GERMANY'S ADVANTAGES OVER THE UNITED STATES.

Business men, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and the people are unanimous in praise of the imperial parcel post. All regard it as indispensable. All wonder how they ever got along without it.

As regards the imperial parcel-post system as a whole, Germany's method of meeting the new economic, industrial, and commercial era upon which it has entered is one that is sure to commend itself in time to the thoughtful statesman.

I desire to call the attention of Senators particularly to the last paragraph. I repeat the quotation:

As regards the imperial parcel-post system as a whole, Germany's method of meeting the new economic, industrial, and commercial era upon which it has entered is one that is sure to commend itself in time to the thoughtful statesman.

Gentlemen, how long a time? Does it not now commend itself to the thoughtful statesmen of our own country; to the thoughtful statesmen of the United States Senate? Is the genius of American statesmanship of the twentieth century, with the experience of the whole world to draw on, unequal to the task of giving to the American people a parcel-post service the equal of that which the statesmen of Germany, without such experience to guide them, gave to the German people over a generation ago? With the evidence before it, with the mass of information accumulated and available for immediate consideration, is the United States Senate going to procrastinate and delay in enacting legislation so plainly beneficent, so urgently needed to reduce the cost of living, and so necessary to the agricultural and commercial prosperity and independence of the country?

How many millions of dollars annually are the people to loose on account of the excessive prices that they must pay for the common necessities of life before Congress will enact legislation that goes to the root of the matter? What deprivations must the people suffer through all the years it will take the Government to build up a postal-express service such as that enjoyed by the German people, if Congress merely enacts the legislation proposed by some of the honorable Members of this body? Better, by far, in my judgment, will it be for the people to wait for a new Congress to enact a thoroughgoing measure than to accept the limited parcel-post measure proposed, which, if adopted, can only prove disappointing in operation and delay indefinitely the enactment of any thoroughgoing measure. I submit, Mr. President, that the only thing that the Senate can do in this matter that is fitting for the highest legislative body in the land is to either enact legislation that meets the needs of the situation in the broad statesmanlike way the German Parliament met it years ago, or to adopt the policy of the House by frankly admitting your lack of knowledge and time, but prove your sincerity by concurring with them and provide a joint committee to thoroughly review the subject and report in full at the opening of the next session.

A few Members of this body, I understand, assert that the carrying of merchandise parcels is not a Government function. Mr. President, the burden of proof is on those who make such assertions, for all the governments of the civilized world have settled the matter by making the carrying of such parcels a part of their postal service. Our own Government is doing so now up to a limit of 4 pounds for its domestic service and to a limit of 11 pounds for its foreign service. In all the controversy for or against a parcel post or a postal express no one has advocated the abolition of the present parcel-post service, and the support of a commercial postal-package delivery in some form or other is well-nigh universal. In the face of such universal indorsement it must be accepted as a conclusively established fact that the carrying of merchandise packages is a proper part of the postal service, and, in my judgment, no Senator can claim to represent the people of his State who does not accept this conclusion.

It being an accepted fact that the carrying of parcels is a Government function, what other consideration, then, than public convenience should determine either the rate or the weight limit of the parcel or small shipment the Government should carry? Congress has come, I think, into a pretty general agreement that legislation must be enacted providing for an extension and improvement of the parcel-post service, but there is not any such general agreement as to what the weight limit or the rates should be. And through all the years since the parcel post has been agitated in Congress there has been no time when such agreement has seemed probable. During this Congress the parcel post and the postal express problems have been more thoroughly considered than ever before, largely with the special purpose of finding a common ground for agreement as to weight limit, distance, and rates. The House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads labored with the problems through hearings and committee meetings, and finally begged the question by asking for the appointment of a special commission to which the matter should be referred. Hardly two members of the committee were agreed as to what were the proper weights, rates, or distances. The recent debates in the House, lasting nearly two weeks, showed the same difference of opinion. Here in the Senate the situation is much the same.

The Senator from Oregon, chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, had ideas as to zones, weights, and rates very different from those of the Senator from Kansas, his associate in the subcommittee, and other members of the committee disagree with both. The Senator from Oregon recommended 6 zones, the Senator from Kansas 12. The Senator from Oregon recommended rates averaging 50 per cent lower than those recommended by the Senator from Kansas. The Senator from Oregon placed the weight limit at 11 pounds, while the Senator from Kansas recommended no weight limit, depending on the automatic adjustment of a reasonable weight limit by a scale of rates that would be prohibitive for excessive weights. I now understand the Senator from Oregon, fearful for the fate of his bill, recently compromised with the Senator from Kansas, and the bill now before you is the product.

But, Mr. President, the point still remains. The Senators from Oregon and Kansas, as members of the special subcommittee, backed by ample funds and unlimited facilities, have given the best part of a year to the effort of producing a bill that will be of lasting benefit to the people and solve the vexatious problems of an adequate postal-package delivery service. Having much in common, Members of the same wing of the same political party, and having, we assume, the same end—that of the public welfare—in view, the net result of their year's effort is that they reached on the vital essentials of a workable system radically different, and I still believe, irreconcilable views. Other members of the committee I find differ as widely in their conclusions on these matters, and I certainly differ from both the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Kansas.

The reason for these differences, Mr. President, is that these are questions no legislative body can decide. They are administrative questions and can only be settled by rate-making and traffic experts. No parcel-post or postal-express legislation will be satisfactory in practice that does not provide for administrative control over the adjusting of rates and weight limits, and the other conditions of traffic movement, as experience in practical operation may demonstrate to be necessary to move the traffic and give the best service. With such provisions properly safeguarded to protect the public from administrative abuses Congress can, regardless of widely divergent opinions on these features, enact a parcel-post or postal-express bill which, whatever the rates, weights, and zones first put into effect may be, will give the country almost immediately the best postal-package system of any country. Instead of following haltingly behind other nations, this great Republic would at once take the place of leader among the nations of the world in providing the best possible form of public service for the benefit of its people.

There has been considerable criticism indulged in by the public press and by some Members of this Congress as to who would be responsible for the failure of Congress at this session to enact a parcel-post bill regardless of whether it meets public needs or not. I want to go on record right here that those Senators and Members of the House alone are responsible who insist upon a rigid bill as to rates, weights, and zones, and who refuse to incorporate several indispensable elements to a working system, or support any parcel-post or postal-express bill that provides for their administrative regulation. On them must rest the responsibility if this Congress fails to enact adequate legislation on this matter so vitally important to the prosperity of the whole people.

There is one thing I believe the investigations and debates of this session have absolutely demonstrated, and that is the fallacy and absurdity of the flat rate as applied to a parcel post or postal-express service in this country. Up to and during recent times the idea of a parcel post has been based on a system limiting the weight of parcels to 11 pounds, with fixed rates of 8 or 12 cents a pound, the idea being to make a flat rate per pound and extend it to all parts of the United States without regard to distance. This idea is now abandoned generally, because the principal reason in asking for a parcel post has been the feeling that the express charges are and have been for years too high to conserve the interests of the people, and when they compare the flat rate and the exorbitant and much-complained-of express charges the absurdity of the flat rate is clearly shown. Upon investigation it will be seen that the express companies' rates on a ton of parcels average $31.20. The flat-rate parcel post, fixing a flat rate of 8 cents per pound, would provide a rate amounting to $160 per ton as a relief from these excessive charges of the express companies, amounting to $31.20 per ton, or rates five and one-half times higher, while the 12-cent-a-pound rate would provide a rate amounting to $240 a ton, or over eight times higher than existing express rates. If we obtain relief from the express company charges, then it must be by getting postal rates that are substantially lower, as in my judgment the whole question of a parcel post is one of lower rather than higher rates. If the rates are not lower, then the parcel post would simply be a paper scheme and of no service to anybody. If the parcel-post rates were actually higher, the system would be a cheat of the whole reform. At best the bills mean that up to 2 pounds they give only as good a rate as the express companies do, with the addition of delivery on rural mail routes, and on weights above 2 pounds fix a much higher rate. Even the rural delivery features of such bills proposing 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound up to 11 pounds are nearly worthless, because, as I have shown previously in my remarks, they limit the articles carried to fourth-class matter, and there is scarcely a thing produced on the farm that falls within the fourth class or that the farmer would be allowed to ship to his customer in town in the form of farm products, so that on account of the limitations such a system would be of very little value to the agricultural people of the country in marketing their products.

The flat rate on parcels discriminates against the short-haul shipper in favor of the long-haul shipper. As far as traffic would move at all the short-haul patron would pay a rate away above cost and the long-haul patron would pay a rate outrageously below cost. The flat rate on letter postage has no such effect and imposes no injustice, because the important element of weight does not enter into its transportation.

THE LOCAL MERCHANT AND THE POSTAL EXPRESS.

All limited parcel-post proposals are opposed by the local merchant, but the same merchant when he understands the postal express becomes its enthusiastic and ardent supporter. The reason is plain. The limited parcel posts all discriminate against the local merchant and if put into operation would be injurious to his business. Whereas the postal express would be not only a benefit but the competition with the mail-order houses and city stores under existing conditions has become so dangerous as to make it absolutely necessary to his continuation in business that the discriminatory shipping advantages now enjoyed by the mail-order houses shall be removed.

The three vital essentials of a parcel-post system that shall be adequate to meet the needs of the local merchant are:

(1) A perfect zone system that will make the local merchant's store the center of the most favorable rates, with rates low enough to move the traffic and positively without discrimination in favor of the big shipper.

(2) A weight limit of at least 100 pounds with a rate declension in weights as well as distance. The rate declension as to distance protects him from the competition of the distant mail-order houses and the rate declension as to weight protects him from the competition of the consumer dealing direct with the producer.

(3) Protection from the unfair discrimination of the private express companies in favor of the big shipper. The small country merchant is too insignificant a factor to be of any consequence to the private express company, and as long as the express business is in private hands he will be discriminated against to the benefit of the big shipper. Only a Government express service can give him adequate and absolute protection.

Measured by these requirements, it is easy to see why the Bourne bill is so unsatisfactory to the local merchant. It does not give him any of the advantages the merchant should have over the consumer, and instead of protecting him from the discrimination of the express companies makes that discrimination more destructive by bringing in operation combination express rates.

Granted, for the sake of argument, that the 11-pound limit is a fairly satisfactory one for the average consumer, but the average weight of 33 pounds of the present express shipments shows how inadequate such a weight limit is for the merchant. However, with a weight limit of 100 pounds, with rates declining as the weight increases, we can have a parcel-post service satisfactory alike to the farmer, the merchant, and the consumer. Instead of violently disturbing the long-established methods of merchandising, such legislation will place it on a sound basis not by killing off the good middleman—the retail merchant—but by getting rid of the monopolistic middleman and by destroying the unfair competition built up on transportation discrimination.

The following tables showing the rate declension as to weights in present average express rates and showing the corresponding declensions feasible under the postal express, will show the importance of the large weight limit and rate declensions based on weight as well as distance, if the present methods of merchandizing through wholesalers and retailers is to be properly safeguarded:

Pounds.	36 miles.		62 miles.		100 miles.		500 miles.

Column (2) feasible postal express rates.
Rates are given in cents and fractions of cents.

By reducing these rates to cents per pound and comparing the light-weight rates with heavy-weight rates we can see at a glance the advantage the merchant (the general user of the heavier parcels) has over the consumer (the general user of the smaller parcels):

Comparison of the 5-pound express rates and postal-express rates with the 100-pound rates in order to show the transportation rate advantage the merchant has over the consumer.

Margin in favor of the large shipment (per cent)	1,000	330	900	300	800	250	400	200

Rates are reduced to cents and fractions of cents per pound. Column (1) present average express rates in cents and fractions. Column (2) feasible postal-express rates in cents and fractions.

To make this point still clearer the following tabulation is made to show the comparative cost of shipping 100 pounds in 20 separate 5-pound packages and in one 100-pound package:

	36 miles.		100 miles.
	(1)	(2)	(1)	(2)
Cost of 100 pounds in 20 5-pound packages	$5.40	$1.60	$7.20	$1.80
Cost in one package of 100 pounds	.54	.52	.89	.73
Difference in favor of the single shipment	4.86	1.08	6.31	1.07

Column (1) present average express rates. Column (2) feasible postal-express rates.

From these tables we see that the rate declension based on weight gives the merchant—that is, the habitual shipper of the larger or wholesale-weight packages—a good cost margin over the small-weight shipment. This margin in transportation charges, added to the advantages of buying at the wholesale rate both factory merchandise and farm produce, is amply sufficient to protect the wide-awake, up-to-date merchant from unfair competition, either from the mail-order houses on the one hand or the producer in dealing direct with the consumer on the other.

Limiting the weight to 11 pounds has no advantage to anyone and is a positive injury to the merchant and the producer. A high weight limit and a rate declension based on both weight and distance is absolutely essential to a system that will be of any material benefit to local merchants and farmers or that will have any marked effect in reducing the cost of living.

EXPRESS COMPANY COMPETITION.

Mr. President, any parcel-post legislation that does not provide for the elimination of express company competition and for the taking over the equipment, depot facilities, storage facilities, and railway-car equipment, or provide equal facilities and equipment, is doomed to prove unsatisfactory from the very beginning. The expectation of the people has been raised too high to satisfy them with half-way measures. Prof. Henry, in an article on "The vital points of the parcel-post problem," which has been published in farm papers of an aggregate circulation of over 6,000,000 copies, has condensed into one sentence what the farmer is expecting the Government to provide, namely:

> An adequate low-cost system of transportation of the perishable, lightweight products of the farm direct to the city consumer and a likewise adequate service to the farmer of what he needs from his nearby trading town.

How are the Post Office officials going to satisfactorily administer a limited parcel-post service with an expectation of that kind, which can only be satisfied with the most complete service, while handicapped and prevented from making a satisfactory showing by the free-lance competition of the express companies taking all the profitable part of the business and paying the railroads only half as much as the Post Office Department?

The character of express competition which can be expected if such a bill as the proposed Bourne bill is passed can be foreseen by a comparison of the Bourne bill rates with the present express rates, and by noting the wide margin for reducing rates below any competing point the railway express contracts give the express companies. These railway contracts give the express companies the right to make rates as low as one and one-half times the corresponding freight rates. I do not claim that the express companies could reduce their rates to these extremely low figures on parcels below 11 pounds and conduct a business at a profit, at least on the short hauls, and on the long hauls under their present contracts with the railroads, but they show the wide margin the express companies have to work on to bring their rates to within the post-office rates. The policy of the express companies has been, and no doubt will continue to be as long as they are in the field, to charge all the traffic will bear, but it never was their policy to maintain rates so high that a competitor could take away from them the cream of the business.

The advantages that the express companies have of making rates that will enable them to take the cream of the business and leave the unprofitable business to the postal service are amply sufficient to show the impossibility of the Government establishing a successful, self-sustaining parcel-post service in competition with them.

The Bourne bill is rigidly confined to eight zones, while the express companies have at least four times as many and may make any number they desire, thus enabling them to grade their rates with a greater degree of fineness and gain all the immense advantages that this close grading gives. The Bourne bill service covers all territory and all people within any zone area for a fixed rate. The express companies only serve the people at the cities along the lines of the railroads, and classify their rates according to grade of service and can make different rates in different parts of the country. Thus in the first instance the express companies have a perfectly legitimate, automatic way of excluding from their service the ungetable and therefore expensive and unprofitable part of the service, and the power of the selection of the profitable part of the business to the exclusion of the unprofitable is increased through the exercise of the right of classification and flexibility in adjusting rates. The express companies have still another immense advantage in the possibility—and undoubtedly probability if conditions require it—of a readjustment of their contracts with the railroad companies, changing the percentage of the railway pay. I have been interested to note how easy it would be for the express companies to meet the Bourne bill rates by the simple expedient of reducing the percentage paid to the railroads on the short hauls to 33 per cent, leaving all of the long hauls at the present contract rate.

COMBINATION EXPRESS RATES.

But it is in the making of combination rates that the express companies have the greatest advantage. By making these combination rates the express companies can compete without changing their present rates, and make absolutely certain of securing all the highly profitable part of the business by giving, in a perfectly legal manner, special favors to the big shippers. Mr. President, I am fully aware that the express companies have been declared common carriers, and under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore must not make rates that are clearly legally discriminative in favor of one shipper as against another, no matter how profitable the business of the one might be as against another. But, Mr. President, the big express companies, if they desire to develop a business based on combination rates in order to keep the profitable small-parcel business away from the postal service, can most effectively by encouraging the building up of local express companies, which will specialize in the combination-package service. The big express companies need have no more to do with the business other than to accept the shipments of the local express companies in units of 20 pounds and up and enter into such contract relations with them as may be necessary to make a feasible working agreement. And there is no power in our Government that could make the local express companies pay any attention to any business that was not profitable to them. The cream of the business would be skimmed and the rest left to Uncle Sam. Such limited parcel-post schemes, so far as they have any effect in compelling the express companies to seriously face competition, can have only the effect, as long as the companies are left in the field to compete, of building up a more dangerously discriminating private express structure than we have ever had before. Talk about a scheme that will help the big mail-order houses and finish the killing off of the rural merchant; here we have it in perfection. Why, of course, these local parasitic express companies will become the distributing agents of the mail-order houses in every city. The cream of the local business will give them the revenue to pay all of their expenses, while their main profits will come from the handling of the mail-order distribution.

Congress can not enact legislation that will insure a self-sustaining parcel post limited to 11 pounds in weight at any rate the Government can make unless express company competition is eliminated, not only in shipments up to 11 pounds, but up to 100 pounds, the unit freight shipment. The express companies must be driven out of the business by the enforcement of the Government postal monopoly and their property made worthless and destroyed and their highly trained, well-organized force of 50,000 employees turned adrift, or by the infinitely more humane, common-sense, and cheaper method of taking over the package part of their business, and instead of driving 50,000 specially trained workmen with their families and dependents to despair, lift them to the happier and better service of the Government. Look at it from which way you please, you can not establish a successful parcel post and leave the express companies in the field. And, Mr. President, you can not drive the express companies out of the business without compensating them in some measure for the damage done to them. The Government postal monopoly can not be enforced to the extent of shutting the express companies out of the package business without compensating them for their losses in the arbitrary destruction of their equipment. The express companies, if Congress passed legislation forcing them out of business, might have a claim for compensation for damages that the courts would allow to be just, and the Government would have to pay the full cost of the equipment, which Congress had, indeed, by its action made into junk, or the act declared unconstitutional. The express companies in any event would be powerful and rich enough to secure before their case was finally settled the full measure of justice, but how about the 50,000 workmen turned adrift? And how about the cost of the equipment the Post Office Department would have to buy to perform the service? If the express companies are driven out of the field, and that they must be driven out is certain, the postal service will be fully as large as the express service it has replaced and will require fully as complete an equipment. To buy such an equipment new will cost fully as much as it will to buy the express equipment. And so the proposition not to buy the express equipment resolves itself down to the plain, cold fact that the people will be compelled to pay for two equipments—the one that must be bought to replace the express equipment which will have been made into junk and the cost of this express equipment in the form of compensation to the express companies for the destruction of their property. If such a plan of settling the parcel-post problem does not fool the people, what does it do?

Mr. President, the people of this country will never pay two prices to secure a postal-express service so far as I have any power by voice or pen to stop it.

But, Mr. President, some parcel-post advocates claim that if the effect of establishing such a competing system as the Bourne parcel-post bill provides results in the express companies reducing their rates, then the people will have been greatly benefited and the legislation will have served its purpose in securing, if not directly, then indirectly by forcing reduction in express rates, greatly reduced parcel delivery rates to the people. If these reduced express rates were to be shared in equally by all the people, there might be some force to that argument; but, as I have shown, there is no power possessed by the Government that can compel the express companies to give equality of service. Reductions in express company rates can only result in a keener skimming of the business. The private service motive, as Congressman LEWIS has so clearly pointed out, forces the express management to concentrate all effort on securing that part of the business that will swell the profits and to ignore all that part of the business that can not be made to show a profit. Government competition can only serve to intensify the discrimination. The inevitable effect of attempting to regulate express rates in this way is to give additional advantages to the big business concerns and to make the lot of the small merchant, to whom this Bourne measure denies the C. O. D. and thus prevents commercial business by post even more hopeless. And at the best the express service is a limited service which can not reach more than a part of the people and only those who are most advantageously located. What is needed is a package service that reaches all the people and gives to all absolute equality of service. Such a service can be supplied only by the Government.

So general now is the belief that the express companies have no economic justification for existence and can not by their very nature give an adequate, fair, and undiscriminating service, that those who refuse to accept the simple plan of getting rid of them by making them the foundation on which to build a Government express service better than that of any other country are driven to the alternative of proposing to destroy them by enforcing the Government postal monopoly or by proposing to force the railroads to do the express business directly.

I have already pointed out that the Government monopoly may not be enforced without the legal possibility of compulsory payment to the express companies for the destruction of their business, and have shown how much better it would be to take these going concerns and buy their equipment and without any disturbance to business start the Government express business at once and improve and extend the service as rapidly as the administrative difficulties involved in each step are mastered. Further word on this score at this time would be superfluous, but a few words to show the impracticability of the proposal to have the railroads do the express business may help clear the situation.

The impracticability of the proposal to have the railroads do the express business direct is, it seems to me, clear on its face. Is it possible that any Member of Congress can believe that Congress would enact laws to compel the railroads to take over the express companies' business without buying their equipment, and is it possible that any Member of Congress, having refused to consider the purchase of the express companies' equipment for the postal service on the plea that it is worthless old junk, can propose to compel the railroads to buy the property? Even if it were possible for the railroads to take over the express companies and do the express business direct the railroads would have to buy the equipment. If the railroads, why not the people, and at the same time get rid of express company competition, the one great obstacle that prevents the success of the postal-package service?

Having the railroads do the express service, assuming that they could do it and do it cheaper than the express companies, will not have bettered the situation so far as the general public is concerned. We will still have the limited service and private motive of operation for profit and all the evils that must result from catering only to the most profitable business and ignoring that which does not pay. Conditions similar to those that we have with the express companies would be inevitable, only probably worse, because, as I have stated before, instead of a few big express companies operating on many railroads we would have as many express companies as there are railroads. As Hon. DAVID J. LEWIS clearly points out in his exhaustive study:

The problem is to get the package rate somewhere as diminutive as the package. In order to do this the simplification and not the multiplication of processes and agencies is the great essential. And we have seen also in the treatment of "transportation accountings" that a small package is now penalized to comparative extinction by the complexity of processes and agencies unavoidable in intercorporate relations, and which only a unification of the agencies and simplification of the processes can remove.

The railroads, even with the most perfect system, could only give a limited service, and could only be expected to serve the people living in the cities along the line of the railroad. They do not reach into the country and would not reach the farmer, and the incentive to get rid of the economic waste of many collect and delivery systems doing the work where one would suffice would inevitably result in the development of local express companies who would attend to this collect and delivery and ship in large combination units.

The small-package business is a peculiar business, requiring for its highest efficiency concentration in one comprehensive system. The remedy for express company evils and the way to make a Government parcel-post system successful is to recognize that the small-package business requires a system that covers the entire country and which can be depended on absolutely to give equality of service to all.

Mr. President, the two main objections raised by the postal-express plan are, first, there is no necessity of paying millions of the people's money for the express company equipment and taking over the package part of the business, because it will be cheaper to build up the people's own parcel-post business without any such expenditures; and, second, that it is the entering wedge to Government ownership of the railways.

As to the first objection, if it could be shown that the Government, all things considered, could give the country an adequate parcel-post service at a cost less than taking over the express equipment and paying a fair price therefor, I would favor it, but my investigations have convinced me that it can not be done. The only way to get a parcel-post service of real service to the country without cost, and get it now and not 10 or 20 years from now, is to take over the express equipment as provided for in my bill. To attempt to build up an adequate system in any other way, or by the slow halting steps and long years of delay inevitable with such limited proposal as the Bourne bill as a beginning, will inevitably cost the Government hundreds of millions of dollars, and end finally in compelling the Government to buy out the express companies at a higher price than ever.

The vital thing in the postal express plan—besides the equipment; besides a highly organized, going, profitable business as a basis to put in operation at once a better parcel-post system than that of any country; besides getting rid of the express-company competition, important as that is and worth every dollar of the cost to the people—the vital thing, Mr. President, is to secure the express companies' contracts with the railways and secure at once the tremendous advantage of a transportation cost—the vital thing in a successful postal package delivery system—about one-half lower than the cost under present railway mail contracts. The post office pays over 13 cents a ton-mile to the railways; the express companies 7 cents a ton-mile. That is the heart and core of the whole proposition. This is the people's "nigger in the woodpile," if you please. It means that the savings on railway pay would justify the condemnation of the express companies in order to secure their contracts, even if the equipment that would be secured at the same time was "worthless old junk," as some opponents of the "postal express" have contemptuously characterized it in their attempts to throw dust in the eyes of the people and take their minds off the real issue. The Bourne bill, with its double railway pay, would lose us more in the first year than the cost of acquiring the express companies.

But it is when we come to consider the volume of new business that would result from establishing a parcel-post system of real service to the people of this country—a better system than that of Germany—that we see the real significance of these express railway contracts. If the Government is to eliminate the express companies, it must give the people a service equally as good. According to the Interstate Commerce Commission reports the 13 express companies in 1909 did an aggregate business of over 9,300,000,000 pounds, at a transportation cost of over $69,000,000. I am only dealing in round figures, but understating the exact amount in all cases. For the Government to attempt to do the business with the present postal railway contracts as a basis the cost would be $130,000,000, or $61,000,000 more than it would be under the express railway contracts.

It is all very well for the uninformed to talk glibly about driving the express companies out of business without buying their equipment and securing possession of these railway contracts, but in what kind of a position does it place Members of Congress who are paid to study the matter with the public welfare in mind? All we have to do to secure the express business honestly and fairly and save the Government these millions of dollars of expense each year is to pay for their equipment, about twenty or thirty million dollars at the most. We gain at once a going concern and put the contract relations of the post office with the railroads on a basis about twice as favorable to the people in the mere matter of railway pay. It is not the equipment, Mr. President, but the express railway contracts that are the vital things in this matter, and I give it as my positive conviction that any Member of Congress, Senator or Representative, who, having the opportunity by this one act of real statesmanship to give the country a perfect parcel-post system, to remove for all time the outrageous discriminations and injustices of the express companies and adjusting the railway mail pay on a basis averaging one-half lower than the present average railway mail rate and on a basis necessary to the operation of a successful parcel post and refuses to give to it his support, fails in his duty to his people. Mr. President, the people are watching these things with an alertness that bodes ill for the Representatives who they feel have misrepresented them by allowing such opportunities to pass.

For the Government to attempt to do the parcel business without securing the express railway contracts would be folly too incredible to believe of any Member of Congress who has sufficiently considered all the facts.

The idea of having a limited weight parcel post established at rates so low that the Government can successfully compete with the express companies and secure all the business of carrying packages below 11 pounds in weight, or by enforcing the Government monopoly secure absolutely the handling of the small-package business to the post office, would be a most expensive proposition as compared with the plan of securing the express railway contracts. The average weight of all express packages is about 33 pounds, and although I have been unable to get an exact statement of the amount of express business below 11 pounds in weight, it is a safe estimate to assume that at least one-fourth of the total is below 11 pounds.

The total, in round figures, for 1909 was 9,300,000,000 pounds, one-fourth of which would be over 2,300,000,000 pounds. The railway cost to the express company for handling that amount of business would be $17,000,000, but the cost to the Government under the present railway mail contracts would be at least $32,000,000, or $15,000,000 more. A pretty big bonus to pay for the privilege of taking the Bourne bill instead of buying out the express companies. How many years, at that excessive cost over the cost of operating under the express contracts, would it take to make this one cost alone exceed the cost of buying the express equipment? Does any Senator believe the people are unable to figure this out for themselves? Does any Senator believe that the people do not understand the difference between the express companies paying the railroads only 7 cents a ton-mile while the Bourne bill compels them, through the post office, to pay over 13 cents per ton-mile? I can assure you that in many places they already have it figured out.

So far I have only considered the present volume of the express business and the present volume of the postal business in considering the cost of operating with or without the express railway contracts. But, Mr. President, this would be only a part, and a small part, of the business that would result from the establishment of a service that opened up the rural districts and reached every householder in the land with a service at considerably less than the present average express rates. The business would expand to enormous proportions, and the excess cost of operating under the present railway mail contracts, instead of as the postal-express bill proposes under the express railway mail contracts, would jump to hundreds of millions of dollars annually. There is only one way, Mr. President, of giving the people a square deal in this matter, and that is to take over the express companies' package business and secure their railway contracts.

Some Senators have said to me, "Can we not get a postal railway pay service as cheap as that enjoyed by the express companies without having to secure their contracts?" I invite any Senator who wants an answer to that question to submit it to the people of his State. Their answer will be, in substance: "These differences in the postal railway pay and the express railway pay have existed for years, and neither Congress nor the postal department has done anything in all these years to secure for the postal service such favorable rates as the express companies have enjoyed. Either there are great difficulties in the way or both Congress and the department have been negligent of the public interest."

What guaranty can you now give that after all these years the railway-mail contracts can be reduced to the level of the express-railway contracts?. The Bourne bill makes no effort on the subject, but ostrichlike, sticks its head in the sand. The truth is, as every Senator must know, there are great difficulties in the way of readjusting the railway-mail pay. My bill provides the plan by which all these difficulties are eliminated and gives instead adjustment at a lower level than would be possible in years by any other method. This and this alone makes this legislation of tremendous and far-reaching importance. What do a few millions more or less mean in such a case as this? According to the estimate of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the total amount required would be only 15 cents per head of the population; the wildest estimate has not exceeded 50 cents per head. But supposing the cost was $1 a head, what is that to the saving it will mean to the people in its effect on reducing the cost of living? There is not a family in the land that will not save that much every week. Do not talk about appointing a commission to inquire into the high cost of living while the pinch of poverty grinds the people to the starvation point and deny the obvious relief to this legislation.

To oppose this legislation on the plea that it will lead to Government ownership of the railroads is but to hasten the day when the idea of Government ownership of the railroads will take an irresistible hold on the people. That is a question I advise the opponents of postal express not to raise, for I can assure them it will not stop the demand for postal express, and may make Government ownership an issue. Of all the arguments against the postal express, this one of its being the entering wedge to the Government ownership of the railroads is the most wildly preposterous. The question of Government ownership of transportation is not involved. The relation of the express companies to the railroads is identical in its character to the relation of the Government to the railroads through the Post Office Department. Both are contractual relationships, pure and simple, in which the railroads agree to transport packages for the other contracting parties—in the one case the express companies, in the other the Government. If taking over the express business puts the Government in the transportation business, then it is already in, and the question of extending that ownership simply becomes one of public expediency.

Those who talk Government ownership fail to distinguish what is the legitimate domain of the postal service and what is the legitimate railroad sphere. The small-package business is a postal function clearly and distinct from the freight functions of the railroads. In Germany, where the Government owns the railroads, the parcel post carries packages up to 110 pounds. Those who object to the post office taking over the express business fail to understand what the express companies really are. They are private corporations which, having squatted on the parcel-post function of the Government, have made a flat failure. They constitute the American parcel-post function, but in private hands have not succeeded in performing that function, but by prohibitive rates and inadequate service are defeating it. The postal-express plan legitimates that function by extending it to the farm through the rural delivery and supplying rates which will enable the normal traffic to move.

Mr. President, the legality of the proposal for the Government to condemn the express railway contracts and make them the basis for operating the Government postal-express service has not been successfully challenged. The bogy of Government ownership of transportation has been raised and attempt to prejudice the people has been tried by the cry that they were merely schemes to pay millions of the people's money for the useless old junk of the thoroughly discredited express companies. Hard names and opposition based on legal technicalities and constitutional subterfuges have largely lost their power, Mr. President, to fool a public growing each day more keenly alert to its own interests.

There is one side of the financial consideration to the people in this taking over of the express-company business, so far as I know, that has not yet been touched upon, and that is the tremendous additional value created for the benefit of the people by the act of consolidating all the express companies into one perfect system. We have passed through an era of consolidation during the last quarter of a century and seen again and again many independent concerns consolidated into one great concern capitalized at many times the aggregate value of the various properties thus absorbed and larger dividends than ever paid on the inflated capital. To prove this we have but to look at the big industrial combinations that have been giving us so much trouble recently.

The present face value of the securities of the so-called Steel Trust is several times the aggregate value of the various properties in the steel industry at the time of their absorption. A big part of this increased market value represents the increased earning power of the consolidated plants due to the enormous economies and greater efficiencies thereby made possible. In the Harvester Trust and many others we have other examples familiar to all. Business in every line of industry has been consolidated in this way, including the express companies so far as their contractual arrangements would permit. Their consolidation into one great agency offers too great an opportunity for trust exploitation to be long delayed after the controlling magnates feel that the time therefor has arrived. Under such circumstances the enormous profits of such consolidation would not go to the people, but to augment the already swollen fortunes of the Morgans and the Rockefellers. But by the Government absorbing the express companies as proposed in the "postal-express" bill this consolidation immediately takes place for the benefit of all the people. Instead of being capitalized to add hundreds of millions to the fortunes of Wall Street bankers, the people would enjoy it in reduced charges and fair service. There is no way of computing the value saved to the people in dollars and cents, but it would run into such big figures that the few millions now required to buy out the express companies are insignificant in comparison.

In some quarters I have found a belief that the railroads are opposed to the acquisition of the express companies by the Government. Considering railroad operation and railroad owners generally, I can find no justification for this belief. Some few railroad magnates who are large stockholders in the express companies may take this view, but that they represent the views of the railway managers generally I very much doubt. Railroad managers, as a general thing, are clear-headed business men, and whatever the advantages of the arrangement with the express companies may have been in the past, signs are accumulating rapidly that the more far-sighted railway managers question the wisdom of its continuance and see more to their advantage in aiding the development of the Government express business. There are two sound reasons for this: First, a growing consideration on the part of the railway management of the importance of the local freight traffic as the main dependence in the future as a dividend producer; and second, a clearer understanding of the natural relationship of the small-package business to the freight traffic. Freight is the great dividend producer for railroads, and managers are beginning to realize that the development of the local freight business will keep pace with the development in the small-package business and that a package business at rates just normally above the freight rates would have a marked effect in increasing freight shipments.

The direct revenue the railroads would receive from the package service would be about the same whether secured from the express company or from postal express. Railway managers know that the freight traffic is tending to become somewhat stationary in amount and that postal express quadrupling the express traffic by normal rates and extension of the service to the country will convert much low-priced freight into higher revenue-paying express traffic for the railway. Under Government operation the revenue per piece might ultimately be reduced, but the enormous increase in the volume of business would more than make up for the difference. Halving present rates and quadrupling the field of operation would easily quadruple the volume of business.

The plain fact is that the parasitical express company has been a veritable old man of the sea to the railroad, throttling its power to expand and develop its local business and yet having to share in all the hatred the express exploitations have created in the hearts of the people. The profits to the railroads in the present alliance with the express companies are only seeming, and because its attractiveness in itself has blinded railroad directors to the bigger profits it strangles. The nature of a parasite, Mr. President, is to destroy that on which it feeds, and the express companies are as big a curse to the railroads as to the people.

The minds of the people everywhere in the United States have been crystallizing more rapidly in consequence of the analysis they have been making through a study of the conditions and necessities embraced in a parcel-post system adequate to meet the demands of the time. Because of this fact it would be far wiser to defer action until the next session of Congress and refer the whole proposition to a committee of the Senate and House selected because of their interest and fitness to study and put together in concrete, comprehenive form the essentials required in a bill to establish a parcel-express system rather than to adopt at this time any poorly digested, ill-considered system such as would have to be adopted now. The people want a full and complete parcel-express service that will articulate the whole country. Already the postal-express proposition has broken down almost entirely the opposition that has heretofore existed and has been actively opposing the primative parcel-post propositions through boards of trade and chambers of commerce and the justified opposition of the local merchant.

Mr. President, 90,000,000 of people are to be directly affected by the adoption of parcel-post legislation. The great consuming public will bear a heavier burden or become a larger beneficiary as an inadequate or adequate parcel post is established. Are the 49,000,000 of people in our cities and towns to have the advantages of a low transportation charge for the small shipment? Are the forty-odd millions in our agricultural sections to have the relief from unequal transportation facilities that they have been asking of Congress for years? Gentlemen, the eyes of these people are now turned upon the Senate. They believe they have a right in demanding recognition of their needs. They do not ask that the Senate spend the rest of the summer discussing this subject. They do not want the Senate to accept any old bill bearing the name of "parcel post" in an attempt to satisfy them or make political capital. They do want the Senate to give this question, which is all important to them, the attention its importance requires. They are willing that Congress take all the time necessary to obtain the best parcel-post system. They are satisfied that the House of Representatives has honestly tried to meet their demands and in the action it has taken is trying to grant their demands, but they are determined that their efforts to secure a real workable parcel post as good as that enjoyed by Germany shall be crowned with success.

An analysis of this subject has convinced every person who has made it that an adequate system for the transport of the small shipment direct from the producer to the consumer contains the elements of a substantial remedy for the high cost of living. If we utilize the existing organizations of the express companies and unite them with the rural-delivery structure, with the postal organization in control over both, a cheap and efficient system of transportation will be produced to carry the necessaries of life from the producer to the consumer, as it now carries our still smaller shipments through the mails. But one thing is in the way of this great consummation. It is the express companies. A transportation parasite absolutely peculiar to America. It renders only half service. It exacts double pay. The first law of business and industry is that the inefficient must give way to the efficient. Shall we suspend its operation for an economic parasite which can only maintain itself as a barrier to normal commerce and the most necessary public welfare?

If Senators hope to retain the confidence of the people; if they are earnest in their professed concern about the high cost of living; if they do not intend to blind their eyes to public welfare in a fruitless attempt to appease the people with a parcel post in name only, they should boldly acknowledge their inability at the present juncture of the session to satisfactorily deal with this complex subject of fundamental importance by accepting the action of the House, thus demonstrating a sincerity of purpose to provide a real parcel post or postal express.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask a question or two of the Senator from Maine before he resumes his seat. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Maine whether he intends to offer his bill as a substitute for the parcel-post provision of the Post Office appropriation bill, which is soon to come before us?

Mr. GARDNER. I will say in answer to that, Mr. President, that I understand the bill that is in the hands of the Post Office Committee is going through the process of evolution rapidly, and I do not know just exactly in what form it will appear here.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that the bill was reported this morning.

Mr. GARDNER. I have not seen the draft.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator another question. What authority has he for the statement that the entire equipment of the express companies can be secured for $30,000,000?

Mr. GARDNER. The only authority I have, Mr. President, is the inventory as given by the express companies themselves in their official report.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand it is now proposed under the Post Office appropriation bill that the Government practically enter into competition with the express companies, but over a limited area of their operations, and that the Senator's contention is that, instead of that, the United States Government shall acquire the equipment of the express companies and engage in the business in its entirety.

Mr. GARDNER. My understanding of the parcel-post provision of the pending Post Office appropriation bill is that it does contemplate covering the entire country, and of course in part in direct competition with the express companies. My contention is that the Government should not in competition with private capital enter the parcel express business, but should take over their property and articulate the entire country with a full and complete system of its own, as it now does in the case of the mail.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator that whilst I have not given very serious consideration to the bill that is pending regarding the parcel post, I have listened with great interest to the presentation that the Senator has made, and it seems to me, upon the first impression, that his argument is conclusive; that if we are to enter this business at all we should enter into it in its entirety, and that the Government itself should not at the very start seek to cover a territory that is now occupied by private business without taking over that business at a fair valuation; and it does seem to me that the operations under the bill which the Senator proposes will involve the Government in no greater complications than will be involved in the parcel post, and it will be a much more satisfactory and complete solution of the entire question so far as the people are concerned.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

During the delivery of Mr. GARDNER's speech,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator kindly suspend for a moment? The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, with a view of ascertaining what we ought to do in relation to the unfinished business and the sundry civil appropriation bill. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine how long he expects it will take him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. GARDNER. I hope to close in 15 minutes. I am as anxious to get through as anyone else could be.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] gave notice that when the unfinished business was laid before the Senate at this hour he expected to address the Senate upon it. I will ask the Senator from Mississippi if it will be satisfactory to him to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business at the present time, in order that the Senator from Maine may conclude his remarks.

Mr. PERCY. That will be entirely satisfactory, if the unfinished business can be laid before the Senate again at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is suggested to me by the Senator from Wyoming that perhaps it would be well not to lay aside the unfinished business, but to let the Senator from Maine proceed and conclude his remarks while the unfinished business continues before the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Unless there is some objection to it, I think that would be the better way.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest that the usual course be pursued, and that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Either course will be equally agreeable to me.

Mr. OVERMAN. It will be all right to follow the suggestion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Maine will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. GARDNER's speech,

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I now call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut demands the regular order—the unfinished business—which is House bill 21969.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. PERCY obtained the floor.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. THORNTON. As the Senator from Mississippi is going to discuss a very important question and the attendance of the Senate is rather limited, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cullom	McCumber	Sanders
Bacon	Cummins	Martin, Va.	Shively
Borah	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bradley	du Pont	Massey	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Fletcher	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Newlands	Smoot
Bryan	Gardner	Oliver	Sutherland
Burnham	Gronna	Overman	Swanson
Burton	Heyburn	Page	Thornton
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Penrose	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Percy	Townsend
Crawford	Kenyon	Perkins	Warren
Culberson	Lippitt	Pomerene	Wetmore

Mr. SHIVELY. My colleague [Mr. KERN] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I am well aware of the congested condition of the business of the Senate, and I shall not undertake any elaborate presentation of the very many important provisions contained in the Panama Canal bill. I shall only undertake, cursorily and more or less informally, to take up what seem to me to be some of the more pregnant features of the proposed legislation.

I was greatly interested in the speech delivered on this bill a few days ago by the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and in his contention that under the language of the treaty with Great Britain we are authorized to discriminate in favor of our shipping whether engaged in the coastwise trade or the foreign trade; not that I favor such a discrimination, for I do not believe that we should give free passage to our shipping, whether engaged in the coastwise or in the foreign trade, but it appealed to me because I was pleased to feel that we had the power to do as we wished with our own without consultation with any other nation.

Subsequent consideration of that contention has convinced me that it is unsound and indefensible. It rests in the main on two grounds: First, that we built the canal at an enormous cost, and therefore it is ours, and we have the right to do as we will with our own; and, second, that the language of the treaty as finally adopted contains a provision that the United States shall adopt rules of neutralization, which are to be observed by other nations, and that this peculiar verbiage puts the United States, as the creator of these rules, in a class separate and apart from the nations that are to observe such rules.

It is true, Mr. President, that we have constructed this canal and in the construction of it have expended from three hundred and seventy-five to four hundred million dollars; but we entered into the construction of it under a treaty, and the obligations of that treaty, the responsibility flowing from it, are in no whit varied by the amount of money which we have expended in the construction of the canal. Whether that amount be $400 or $400,000,000, it is immaterial, so far as our burdens under the treaty are concerned.

The verbiage referred to, however, as constituting the second ground for this contention is significant. When this treaty was before the Senate in December, 1900, the second article of the treaty provided that the "high contracting parties" adopt the rules for the neutralization of the canal. When the treaty was before the Senate a year later in the form in which it was finally adopted, article 3 contained the provision that "the United States adopts" those rules which govern the neutralization of the canal. The change was a significant one and was so recognized by the high contracting parties at the time it was under consideration.

In the memorandum submitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and which that committee had before it in considering the treaty for the second time, Secretary Hay uses this language, as noting the importance of that change in verbiage:

> Second. By a change in the first line of article 3, instead of the United States and Great Britain jointly adopting as the basis of the neutralization of the canal the rules of neutrality prescribed for its use as was provided by the former treaty, the United States now alone adopts them.
> This was regarded as a very radical and important change and one which would go far toward a reconciliation of the conflicting views of the two Governments.
> It relieves Great Britain of all responsibility and obligation to enforce the neutrality of the canal, which by the former treaty had been imposed upon or assumed by her jointly with the United States, and thus meets the main stress of the objection which seemed to underlie or be interwoven with her other objections to the former Senate amendments.

Again, the Marquis of Lansdowne, in commenting on the significance of that change in verbiage, uses this language:

> 5. In form the new draft differs from the convention of 1900, under which the high contracting parties, after agreeing that the canal might be constructed by the United States, undertook to adopt certain rules as the basis upon which the canal was to be neutralized. In the new draft the United States intimate their readiness "to adopt" somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal, would henceforward be assumed by the Government of the United States. The change of form is an important one.

Again, he says:

> It is also to be borne in mind that, owing to the omission of the words under which this country became jointly bound to defend the neutrality of the canal, and the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the obligations of Great Britain would be materially diminished.

This memoranda was before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations when the Senate was considering the second treaty. Thereby the Senate was thoroughly apprised of the construction placed by Great Britain upon this change in verbiage.

The sole effect given by the contracting parties to that change in the verbiage of the treaty was that Great Britain was thereby relieved from the responsibility of guaranteeing the neutrality of the canal, and that it left as the sole guarantor of that neutrality the United States. In view of that important concession to Great Britain—and as a concession to Great Britain alone was it regarded—Great Britain agreed to leave out of the first clause the words "in time of peace and war," and agreed to leave out section 7 of article 3, which forbade the fortification of the canal, recognizing that in time of war the United States, as the sole guarantor of the neutrality of the canal, might desire to fortify it, and might desire to prevent the passage through it of a hostile fleet, and, under such circumstances, recognized the fact that the United States could be remitted to her right of self-defense as if there were no treaty as would the belligerent power with whom she was at war; but nowhere does it appear in the correspondence in reference to this change and nowhere, so far as we can learn, was it intimated in the discussion of the terms of this treaty in the United States Senate that that change of verbiage in any manner restricted the inhibition against discrimination.

The two sections are identical. The language of the first treaty, under which the high contracting parties adopted the rules of neutralization as set forth in section 1 of article 2, provided:

> 1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

That was the form of that provision when the two high contracting parties jointly undertook to guarantee the neutrality of the canal. That change was made in it when the United States alone became the guarantor of the neutrality of the canal, as it appears in the first paragraph of article 3 of the treaty as finally adopted:

> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

No more right to discriminate was given under the treaty as finally adopted than was given under the treaty by which neutrality was guaranteed by both high contracting parties. The rule as finally adopted met with the approval of Great Britain. Is there a Senator here who can for one moment conceive that that treaty would have met with the approval of Great Britain if it had contained the language by amendment in the Senate which it is now sought to be incorporated in the construction of it, namely, if it had read: "There shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise, except discriminations in favor of the shipping of the United States"?

It is inconceivable, in view of the entire course of the negotiations, that an amendment of that sort would not have caused the instant rejection of the treaty.

Mr. President, it has been said that possibly we can not get a fair court in case of arbitration. We do not want a fair court if that is the contention that we must arbitrate, for I do not believe that there is a tribunal on earth that would sustain that contention on our behalf.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator, in view of his construction of the treaty, if there is a single right that the United States has with reference to the use of the canal that must not be shared by it on an equality with Great Britain or any other power on earth? If that is the view the Senator takes, he is totally at variance with some of the distinguished men of Great Britain, who insist that in so far as our coastwise trade is concerned, where there can be no competition under our navigation laws, the United States has a right to do just as it pleases with reference to the use of the canal and to the fixing of tolls.

Mr. PERCY. If I conceded the correctness of the Senator's statement that there is no competition in our coastwise trade, I might concede the correctness of the conclusion. I think, as I shall show later, that the statement that there is no competition in our coastwise trade is fundamentally incorrect.

We have few superior rights; we have many obligations not incurred by other nations. Mr. President, not only——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What are they? I should like the Senator to state what they are.

Mr. PERCY. What—the obligations?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What are the rights we have?

Mr. PERCY. I said we had few superior rights. I might have said none.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is a better way to put it.

Mr. PERCY. I will go further. Not only do I believe there is no tribunal to which we could submit this controversy with the hope of our contention being upheld, but I question if there be an international tribunal to which a Senator here could present that contention in such a manner as in the eyes of the nations of the world to relieve us of the charge of being engaged in a disreputable attempt to evade the obligations of a solemn contract.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this treaty, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, purports to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which was entered into in 1850. There has not been a time since 1850 until the execution of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty when it has not been insisted time and time again by our Government that Great Britain has constantly failed to keep the terms of that treaty. So it has been regarded as an obsolete treaty, so far as it was concerned; and I think the Senator must concede that the terms of the treaty, if the correspondence in the State Department is to be considered at all, were continually violated by Great Britain.

Mr. PERCY. There is one thing certain, and that is that the Senate of the United States, when it negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, did not consider that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been abrogated by Great Britain's violation of it. They treated it as a living article which had to be gotten out of the way, and that was why obligations were incurred in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which otherwise would not have been incurred, and that is why Great Britain's consent was deemed to be necessary to enable us to acquire a strip of land and build a canal with our own money.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the Senator from Oregon cite one instance in which this Government has declared, since 1850, that Great Britain was not obligated to the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. We did make some complaint that she had not in good faith lived up to that treaty in respect to the Mosquito Reservation, but I do not recall a single instance in which we have not declared that she was bound by that treaty and bound by its terms as well as we were.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PERCY. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the attention of the Senator to the message of President Buchanan, which ought to be pretty good Democratic authority, sent to this Congress, I think, in 1860, denouncing the course of Great Britain with reference to the observance of the provisions of the treaty, and asking Congress to take some steps in reference to it. They had violated it with reference to the Mosquito country. They had violated it with reference to the keeping of an armed force at Honduras, and in other respects, to which President Buchanan particularly called the attention of Congress. But not only that, but in order to get away from these repeated violations of the treaty of 1850, Great Britain attempted to make treaties with certain Central American Republics to satisfy the complaints of the United States, and President Buchanan afterwards, in a message to Congress, said he hoped Great Britain had finally concluded by these treaties the causes of complaint on the part of this country.

Even after that Secretary Cass and other distinguished Secretaries of State declared again that Great Britain was not observing the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and it had come to be looked upon as obsolete and abrogated by the course Great Britain was taking.

With all due respect to our own Government, it seems to me that they allowed themselves to be imposed upon when they undertook in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to claim that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been superseded, because, as I say, it had been abrogated entirely.

Mr. McCUMBER. The statement of the Senator from Oregon corroborates my challenge to produce one instance where this country has declared that Great Britain was not bound by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I admitted that this country had complained that Great Britain was not acting in good faith with reference to the Mosquito colony and the Mosquito territory, but in no instance did Mr. Buchanan or any other President ever declare that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not a binding obligation upon both of the countries.

Mr. PERCY. The distinction drawn by the Senator from North Dakota is the vital distinction in the matter. It is a waste of time to go back and complain of Great Britain, even if she did violate in some particulars the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That is absolutely immaterial. It does not rise to the dignity of a national question. If she had violated that treaty every year of its existence, and if this Government in forming the Hay-Pauncefote treaty then recognized it as an existing treaty between her and Great Britain and proceeded to make the latter treaty in order to get rid of it, the whole question would be: What are the obligations which this Government by the latter treaty assumed in order to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

Now, Mr. President, much stress has been laid upon the fact that in section 1 of article 3 the provision is that "the canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations" without discrimination; and the argument is made that as our canal is undoubtedly open to our war vessels free, and this provision could not have referred to them, it can not apply to our vessels of commerce.

Mr. President, when this treaty was being negotiated it was not known how this canal would be built, whether built by the United States Government directly or by corporations backed by her, by bonds guaranteed by her or by stocks issued, and the language of the treaty was that the canal might be built "under the auspices of the United States." If it had been built by private corporations, simply financed by the United States, would there have been anything unreasonable in the provision that the vessels of war of the United States should pay tolls as the vessels of war of other nations? It was to meet that view that that language was framed. There are many things in this treaty that may appear harsh now which, if the canal had been built in a different way, simply under "the auspices" of this Government, would have appeared reasonable to us. But the truth is, Mr. President, that as we spent our money on the canal, as we watched its vicissitudes and its failures, as we at last have come to the day when final success in this great work seems near at hand, the pride of the Nation has grown, and her sense of proprietorship over the canal has grown, and it may be with the passing years a sense of responsibility for our own obligations incurred under the treaty has not kept pace. We not only do not want to take the wrong course here; we do not want to be cast in an international suit; we do not want to raise questions which will alienate and estrange the friendship of those whom we wish to use our canal. We do not want our big ditch, built at a cost of $400,000,000, to be empty of ships. We want that canal to be a great highway of commerce, not an element of discord, but binding closer together in the bonds of commercial friendship the nations of the earth.

It matters not, Mr. President, if the contract under which we built it is a hard contract. We may have made hard contracts in the past. This may be one of them, although I do not concede it; but this Government has never and I believe will never make a contract, however onerous its conditions, that it is not easier to keep than it is to violate.

What would be the penalty if our construction should be an erroneous one? I call the attention of the Senate to a colloquy on that subject which occurred between the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]:

Mr. WARREN. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?
Mr. O'GORMAN. Not at all.

Mr. WARREN. I am much interested in the remarks of the Senator from New York, and they are along the line of my own thought. I want to ask him what would be the worst that could happen if we were wrong and should enact the legislation proposed and the matter should go to The Hague? Would it not be at the utmost simply to return the money we had collected?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That would, in my judgment, be the extreme penalty; but I do not believe Great Britain would ever attempt to make this the subject of inquiry by The Hague court, because she would be without moral support, and she would be giving the lie to her professions of sincerity and good will of a century.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator, but in legislation as in business it is always best to look at both sides and to know what the relations might be and what the alternatives. It seems to me that the worst that could happen would be, after collecting the tolls and enjoying for a time the use of the money, to find that we might be compelled to return all or some portion of it; and that would be the extreme penalty.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And that would bring its compensation, because it would inevitably lead to the denunciation of this treaty and its abrogation.

Mr. WARREN. And an entire settlement as to all questions.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. President, without commenting upon the wisdom or the propriety of entering into the discussion of the terms of a treaty with a friendly power by questioning her sincerity and impugning her motives, passing by the plain intimation contained in this colloquy that it might be well to enter even upon an unjust quarrel to get rid of the conditions of a just contract, and coming to the conclusion concurred in by both of these distinguished Senators, namely, that an arbitration of our contention and a decision against us would lead to a denunciation and an abrogation of this treaty, Mr. President, it must be that these two distinguished Senators did not give this as their deliberate judgment. It must have been an inadvertent expression on their part arising out of an unpremeditated turn to the debate.

If there is anything certain, it is certain that no matter how that contention was decided by a court of arbitration, the treaty in its entirety would remain in effect, and whatever may be our differences of opinion in regard to the construction of this treaty, there is one thing that we should not differ on, and that is that we can not have secured the benefits of it and now repudiate the obligations of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. In that connection I would like to submit for the Senator's consideration what appears to be a report of statements made by Sir Gilbert Parker, the World's correspondent, on July 20, and to ask him to reflect upon the views entertained by Sir Gilbert Parker. In the newspaper he is quoted as saying:

> Personally, I think there is no question about a strict international understanding upon the matter. It certainly was not expected by England nor by the United States when they made the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that preference should be given to American shipping and American traders in the canal. It must, however, be recognized, as it was when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded, that there are moral rights as well as strictly legal rights in the matter, and just as England's moral rights had lapsed under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in regard to the canal, so America's moral rights have grown since the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was signed.
> MADE THAT HIGHWAY POSSIBLE.
> The American Government and the American people have made that highway possible to the world. Without them probably it never would have been, and in any just settlement of the question these greatly increased moral rights of the United States must be recognized.
> Preference or exemption does not look well from an international point of view, and I hope a way out may be found to meet the undoubted claims of the United States to special consideration and at the same time satisfy international rights and safeguard the British imperial interests, which are so large upon the American continent.

Mr. PERCY. I would say in regard to that, Mr. President, that if Sir Gilbert Parker is potential enough with the powers in control of legislation in Great Britain to have that view adopted by them there would be little friction about being released from our legal obligations, but there is no such thing possible as our being justified in violating our legal obligations because of the growth of our moral rights. It should be recognized, Mr. President, that having reaped the fruits of this treaty in honor, we can not escape from its obligations, and in dishonor the American Nation will never seek to escape from them.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator has repeated a number of times that we have reaped the fruits of this treaty. I should like him to specify what the fruits are.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, without the abolition of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty we could never have obtained any exclusive control over a canal. We could never have gone there for the purpose of building one, except subject to the joint and equal rights and responsibilities on the part of Great Britain, and without going into a consideration of the value of that which we received by the abolition of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it seems to me that it is sufficient to say that we received what the Senate of the United States thought was a sufficient consideration for entering into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will permit, it seems to me, then, from the tenor of the discussion that there was a treaty known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which England violated whenever it pleased and which the United States did not, which was binding on us and not on England; and in order to get rid of such a one-sided arrangement we agreed to spend $400,000,000 in constructing a canal and give England and other nations rights that we did not have and would not claim.

Mr. PERCY. The misfortune lies in the fact that the Senator from Kansas was not a Member of the United States Senate in 1901, when this treaty was adopted, as then his voice, always able and eloquent, might have been raised to have guarded the Senate against the adoption of what he considers to be a hard treaty.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that I do not consider the treaty a hard treaty at all, and the construction put upon the treaty by the Senator from Mississippi is entirely different from that I put upon it. I do not consider that the treaty in any way binds the United States not to discriminate in favor of its own vessels or to use its own canals in any way it chooses for its own benefit, provided it does not discriminate as between foreign countries.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, any other course than the recognition to the utmost limit of the responsibilities incurred by the United States under this treaty leads to national dishonor, and that road this Nation will not travel. It has been said that the sole consequence of this interpretation being hereafter found to be erroneous would lie in the refunding of the tolls improperly collected pending the final decision. That might be a sufficient deterrent because the facts appear to be that more than 80 per cent of the shipping which will use this canal will be foreign shipping, that a little more than 10 per cent of it will be coastwise shipping, and something like 8 per cent of our own shipping engaged in foreign trade.

At the rate of $10,000,000 a year, the claims for a refund of these tolls, while the case is being considered by the international tribunal to which it may be submitted, at the end of that time, according to the length of time the matter is under consideration, will amount to from fifty to a hundred million dollars, which will be filed against our Government, and for the sake of saving to our coastwise trade a little more than a million dollars we will be forced to carry free for a period of more than five years, in all probability, the trade of the world. That is not all, Mr. President.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. This fifty or one hundred millions, to use the Senator's own term, which, I think, is greatly exaggerated——

Mr. PERCY. It would depend upon the length of time which would elapse before a decision.

Mr. BRISTOW. The United States would not have to pay it. The United States would simply have collected and used it and at the end of this time possibly refund it.

Mr. PERCY. If with nations, as with individuals, the same rule applies, money that has been spent and has to be refunded, amounts in practical consequences to a payment, and often is just as difficult to make.

But that is not all, Mr. President. When this matter is submitted for arbitration on our contention that we have a right to discriminate in favor of our shipping, this Nation for all the years that that would be pending would be watching the result of that decision. The pride of the Nation would be enlisted in maintaining her contention, and when an adverse decision should be rendered, as I believe fervently it would be, it would bring bitterness and humiliation to our people. And that great work, which to-day is a source of pride and glory to the Nation, might come to be a source of shame and reproach.

Mr. President, within the past few days it has been suggested that that question is not such as we should submit to a court of arbitration. I apprehend that without the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, either by treaty or by the declaration that owing to its violation by Great Britain we declared it abrogated, we would have had no more right to have acquired this strip of land and built this canal upon it than Great Britain would have to-day, if by treaty she had recognized the Monroe doctrine, to acquire or colonize a South American State; and when the document by which we abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is in controversy between us and a friendly nation, and that nation makes the demand upon us to submit that difference to arbitration, and we should refuse to do so, we would have made a mock of all of our protestations in regard to peace and the settlement of differences by arbitration. It would be proven to have been all sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. Thereafter I can but feel that the representatives of this Nation would be laughed, jeered, and hissed out of any peace country on the face of the earth.

For these reasons I believe that this matter should be thrashed out now, and I believe those who feel that the discrimination in favor of our ships is a mistake should present every argument within their power to lead the Senate to that view, and for that reason I regret that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], in addition to giving his conclusions to the Senate on this question, did not also give the benefit of the reasons which made him adopt those conclusions, even though his words should return to vex us.

But it is said, Mr. President, if this construction be true, what has the building of the canal profited this Nation? The suggestion has even been made that if we decline to fortify it it has only served in time of war to bring our shores closer to an enemy. If that be true, Mr. President, is there not compensation in the thought that in time of war it would bring that enemy's shores closer to us? Since when in time of war has this Nation found its safety in the distance that lies between it and an enemy? In the future as in the past we must rely upon American ships, manned by American sailors, for the safety of this Republic.

But in answer to the question as to what we would gain by the building of this canal and the expenditure of this money, under the construction that I place upon the treaty, I would say that we would gain everything that for a period of 50 years we thought would compensate us for the labor and for the expenditure. From a naval standpoint we have gained the ability to mobilize our fleet on either shore so as not to require the maintenance of a separate and distinct fleet in each ocean. From a commercial standpoint we have brought together the two widely separated coast lines of our country, giving to each coast a market in the other and easier access to the markets of the world.

And last, we hope by the competition that will follow in the shipping through that canal to give lower rates to the shippers, to regulate and lower the rates of the great transcontinental railways not only for the benefit of our coast country, but for the benefit of the interior country to the extent of hundreds of miles, where rates are affected by the joint water and rail rate.

The most important question, Mr. President, in connection with this entire bill is whether the hope of the American people for competition through that canal is going to be realized or will it, like Dead Sea fruit, turn to ashes on the lips of the people.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Mississippi, believing that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty requires that there shall be no discrimination in tolls, has suggested a theory upon which I would like a little information.

The canal being built for the benefit of the world, and equally for all the world, does the Senator from Mississippi believe that we ought to have no tolls at all on any ships, but that we ought to continue in the future to make this contribution to the welfare of the world as we have made it in the expenditure of the money necessary to construct the canal? In other words, is the Senator in favor of free world passage, without any compensation whatever to any ships?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, a great deal may be said in favor even of that view, for if the tolls are paid, as those who contend for the remission of tolls on the coastwise trade say, by the shippers, thereby causing a higher freight rate, then the shippers of the United States, 90 per cent of whose foreign business is carried in foreign ships, would pay the tolls for those ships.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I am asking the question, Does the Senator from Mississippi believe that there ought to be anything charged to any ship for passage through the canal?

Mr. PERCY. I was answering the Senator's question. I said that much might be said in favor of the proposition that nothing should be charged, but I do not believe that the proposition is a wise one. I should favor charging tolls. We are at liberty to charge or not as we see fit, so long as we treat all alike.

Mr. CUMMINS. That leads me to put the further inquiry: If the United States has expended $400,000,000 for the general benefit of the world, why should it not continue to contribute year after year the expense of maintaining the canal for the benefit of the world?

Mr. PERCY. That is a matter of policy that the Government could pass on. We are fettered by no treaty as to that. There are some good reasons why it might make this a free offering, reaping in commerce and in lower rates the benefit, instead of in tolls, because we would be the chief beneficiaries of that canal so far as producers and consumers go. We ship our exports through the canal and we bring in our imports through the canal, and at last if tolls mean higher rates the American people would be paying them, even for much of the foreign shipping.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi further yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Having interrupted the Senator once, I will take the liberty of doing it again.

Mr. PERCY. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was very sorry to hear the Senator declare as an unquestioned proposition that under our arbitration treaties with Great Britain or under The Hague convention we were bound to submit the controversy that has arisen over the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to a court of arbitration. It seems to me that anyone who has reached that conclusion has not viewed the case in all its aspects. I for one do not believe that we have made any agreement with any nation at any time that would compel us in honor to submit the controversy which we are now debating to arbitration. I do not believe it is capable of being submitted to arbitration. There is a fundamental maxim which lies at the bottom of all judicature of every civilized nation that forbids the submission of this question to arbitration. There is a maxim which declares that no man may be the judge of his own case. It is vital. It would be impossible to administer justice without having it in view.

Now, the Senator from Mississippi, of course, knows, as we all know, that it would be utterly impossible to gather together a tribunal of the civilized nations of the world in which every member would not be directly interested in the decision of the case. I would myself just as soon submit the case to Great Britain for its ultimate and final decision as to submit it to The Hague tribunal, or to any other board of arbitration that would be brought together under any scheme or treaty of arbitration.

There must be some other way, it seems to me, of settling this dispute, for you can not get an impartial jury. The cause which I have just suggested would eliminate from any panel of jurymen gathered together in this country every representative of any commercial country, simply because they are all interested, just as Great Britain is interested, in having it decided that America can not charge more to them for passing through the canal than it charges to its own ships.

I should like to submit that consideration to the Senator from Mississippi, who I know looks at the subject from a very high, patriotic standpoint, and know what he thinks of that suggestion.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the nations of Europe, it is true, would all be more or less interested in a decision which forbade discrimination in favor of our shipping. That interest, however, in many cases would be almost infinitesimal owing to two facts. One is that nations might be chosen as arbitrators having very little shipping interest which could compete with the shipping of the United States, and another is that unless the carrying of our freight to foreign ports in American vessels ceases to diminish in the future as it has in the past in a few years there will not be any foreign commerce carried in American vessels to compete. There is to-day less than 8 per cent of the commerce of our country carried to foreign ports in American ships. So the interest in many cases would be small, not such an interest, I take it, as would cloud the judgment of those sitting in so solemn a tribunal to the point of excluding from their minds the consciousness of justice and of right. I take it, Mr. President, that a tribunal could be selected from which a fair decision could be expected.

If the argument is a correct and a sound one that any degree of interest, however slight, would insure an adverse decision in a contention by this Government before an international tribunal, it might well cause us to pause in our urgent demand that international differences be submitted to arbitration, because there can scarcely a case arise where we in our isolation and separation from the nations of the world may not have cause to anticipate that their community of interest will draw them close enough together to furnish a motive to them for deciding against us in a controversy. There must be some loftier conception of the honor and sense of justice of those who will compose those tribunals or else arbitration is a failure and a resort to war the proper method of settling international differences.

Now, Mr. President, just a few suggestions in regard to what is at last the paramount question contained in this bill, namely, Will this canal furnish any competition in rates which will regulate or lower the rates of the transcontinental railways? If not, it will assuredly be a failure and a disappointment to the American people.

The first danger that is suggested in regard to that competition is that if railroad-owned ships are allowed to go through the canal, competition will be throttled by the rates being first put down to the point of driving out competition and then put up so as to furnish no competition with the transcontinental railways.

I am not one of those who consider that danger a mythical one, if we are to judge of the course of the railroads in the future by what has been their history in the past. They have been ruthless in throttling competition by the waterways of this country wherever they were in a position to do so. If that suspicion lies in the minds of the American people, it has been placed there by the course of conduct pursued in the past by the railways of this country.

The House bill as it came to the Senate sought to meet that danger by providing in substance (without taking the time to read the provision) that no railroad-owned vessel should be allowed to go through the canal. The Senate committee modified that so as to provide in substance that a railroad-owned vessel engaged in foreign trade, trans-Atlantic or oriental, could engage in coastwise trade on a journey through the canal, provided that 50 per cent of her cargo should be destined to a trans-Atlantic or oriental port. With this limitation the committee thought that there would be no real danger of railroads throttling competition through the canal, and they feared to take from the canal the shipping that the railroads might furnish for fear of impairing the shipping facilities of the public, as to-day 90 per cent of the ships that would go through the canal are railroad owned.

There is another danger which threatens competition in rates through the canal, and that is with the railroad-owned ships excluded from it the coastwise shipping will give to the American people the same competition through that canal in the future as they have given to them elsewhere in the past, and that is no competition. From New York north all of the coastwise trade on the Atlantic coast is under the power and control of one railroad. From New York south there is not the semblance of competition between the lines plying southward. Leaving New York on the same day, they do not even stop at the same ports; they parcel out ports so as to avoid the appearance of competition.

Is there a reason to believe that better competition will be given by the coastwise trade when given the monopoly of the business through the canal than it has given the American people in the past? Judging of the future of the railroads by their past history they will throttle competition if they can. The American coastwise shipping, judging the future by its past history, will furnish no competition.

So in either event it would seem that the canal will not realize that for which the American people built it, namely, give them a substantially lower rate than transcontinental railway rates.

In what way can this competition be furnished? I know of but one way, and that is by providing that the ships of the world shall have the right to carry from a port or ports of the Atlantic to a port or ports of the Pacific commerce through the canal on the same terms that American shipping does.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that if that principal was adopted there would be an American ship engaged in that trade, considering the fact that every other Government is heavily subsidizing its ships? Does the Senator really think that without Government subsidies in our country we could possibly compete with other countries in that trade on equal terms?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, this provision would deprive the American coastwise trade of no pound of freight that it carries to-day, except that transported over the Panama Railroad. It would leave that trade absolutely intact as it is to-day, but would prevent the extension of that monopoly to trade through the canal..

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if I did not misunderstand the Senator, I really can not quite comprehend what he means by that assertion. If all the tramp steamships and other steamships of foreign countries are placed on an equality with our ships, with the immense subsidies that Japan and England and Germany and Sweden are giving their ships, does the Senator really think that our ships would still have the trade? The Senator knows that it is at least from 25 to 30 per cent more expensive to navigate American ships than the ships of foreign countries.

Mr. PERCY. The Senator has not caught the scope of the suggestion which I made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I must have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. PERCY. The difference is this: My suggestion is not that foreign ships be permitted to do business from port to port on the Atlantic or port to port on the Pacific, but from port or ports on the Atlantic to port or ports on the Pacific. It is more succinctly, possibly, set forth in this amendment which I will read and which I propose to introduce carrying out the suggestion which I have made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not see, if the Senator will permit me a single word, that that makes any difference in the principle, and I am very sure that it would drive off the canal every American ship.

Mr. PERCY. I understood it was the fact and not the principle the Senator was interrogating me in regard to.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I suggested in my first remark that I wanted to understand the principle, as I do.

Mr. PERCY. I will say this with regard to the principle. If the Senator is correct that it would drive off all American shipping, it could only do it because foreign shipping furnished better service to the American people at a cheaper rate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PERCY. Then the question would arise as to whether the canal was built for the benefit of the shipowners or for the benefit of the American people.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right about that, precisely as if we engaged in free trade with all the countries of the world, and our factories were blotted out because the other countries can produce cheaper than we, that it might be an advantage to the American people. I do not think it would. We understand that with England, we understand that with Germany, and France, and every other European nation almost, subsidizing their ships very heavily, operating their ships much cheaper than we can, it would drive the American ships off, even if we got a little cheaper transportation, which I very much doubt, because we would create a foreign monopoly. Even if we did do it, I question the propriety of destroying an American industry for the benefit of foreign countries.

Mr. PERCY. Of course, Mr. President, I anticipated that objection from those who would consider the interest of the American shipowners as paramount to that of the American people. But I will first read the amendment, which I think covers the proposition:

Amend section 11 by striking out all of that part of said section on page 20 and the first 16 lines of said section on page 21, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Section 4347 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of February 17, 1898, shall not apply to foreign vessels engaged in the transportation of merchandise and passengers between ports of the United States on the Atlantic Ocean or Gulf of Mexico and on the Pacific Ocean through the Panama Canal, but nothing herein contained shall authorize such vessels to engage in the coastwise trade either as to merchandise or passengers between ports on the Atlantic Ocean or Gulf of Mexico or between ports on the Pacific Ocean."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PERCY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether I properly understood the fact stated by him regarding the competition of water lines. I understood him to say that under existing conditions there is no real competition furnished by our water lines on the Pacific coast.

Mr. PERCY. Absolutely none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That on the New England coast and down to New York the lines were all railroad-owned lines.

Mr. PERCY. Owned by one railroad company.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Owned by one railroad, and that below New York the lines there were not competitive in any way. Now, I wish to ask him whether as to the lines between New York and southern ports they are not also owned by the railroads.

Mr. PERCY. The statement is made by Dr. Johnson, who has investigated the matter, that more than 90 per cent of the interest in the lines on the Atlantic coast below New York are owned by railroads, controlled by railroads, or operated in harmony with railroad-owned lines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well. If that is the case and competition is absolutely destroyed through the railroad ownership of these lines, can not that competition be restored by preventing the ownership of these lines by the railroads?

Mr. PERCY. There is a bill of that sort pending. But there are those who believe from experience that even where there are independent lines a shipping monopoly, with a pool or combination in regard to rates, where that shipping is confined solely to American shipping, is as easily effected and as effective as a railroad combination.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But under the enforcement of our trust laws would not the organization of such a combination be prevented?

Mr. PERCY. Our trust laws have not been so effective in preventing combinations in matters clearly within their purview as to make me feel a great amount of confidence as to their efficiency in preventing combinations among lines of ships.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All that I have to complain of in the Senator's statement is that, whilst we are endeavoring to secure competition through the Panama Canal by preventing any railroad line from owning ships passing through that canal or preventing ships belonging to any railroad line from passing through that canal, the Senator states that, notwithstanding such precautions, competition will utterly fail; and he gives as an illustration the fact that competition has failed upon the Atlantic coast. Yet he admits—or must admit—it seems to me, that the reason why competition has failed upon the Atlantic coast is that under existing laws railroads own and control the lines of steamships which ought to be competitive with them. It seems to me that logically, then, the way to cure that condition on the Atlantic coast is to adopt the legislation which we propose to apply to the Panama Canal, and thus prevent these great railway monopolies from monopolizing the ocean through the ownership of lines of steamships that ought to be competitive.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, there is no question that the competition among the boats is diminished by railroad ownership, but there is also little question that the lines themselves of boats themselves, would effect combinations which would serve to prevent the lowering of rates so that there would be no genuine competition with the transcontinental railway lines. To meet that—and that danger is apparent, palpable, real—it has been urged that the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission be extended over all vessels plying through the canal.

The answer to that is not only is it difficult to regulate water rates and water freights by law, but when you do regulate them you substitute absolutely regulation for competition; and until competition is proven to be a failure I do not believe regulation should be substituted in lieu of it. That, I may say, is the view advocated by the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission who appeared before the Isthmian Canal Committee. Instead of regulating rates through the canal, and thereby depriving shippers of the benefit of the keenest competition that can be secured, instead of taking ships off of the Panama Canal, I would seek to give competition by putting on that canal by legislation every ship that I could. Then when I found that, through pools, combines, and trusts, competition had failed to lower rates, I would undertake the regulation of those rates, because I would be driven to it.

In regulating them I would propose a measure more radical than regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I believe, if the canal were thrown open on the lines indicated in this amendment to the shipping of the world, that the competition would be so fierce that the transcontinental railroads would only carry that kind of freight peculiarly meant for railroad transportation, and only carry that by giving quicker and better service and a lower rate. In that way, and in that way only, the American shipping public would receive a benefit extending through two-thirds of our country. Then, if I found that a pool or combination existed, such as it is suggested now exists in transatlantic business, I would give the power to the Chief Executive, whenever he became satisfied that a ship or line of ships operating through the canal was a member of a combine or a trust which sought to lower rates, to forbid such ship or ships from going through the canal—a great power to give to a Chief Executive, but the bestowal of it alone would obviate the necessity for its exercise.

Mr. President, the question suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] brings us back to one consideration; that is, whether we built the Panama Canal for the benefit of the shipbuilder or for the benefit of the American people. If built for the benefit of the shipbuilder, he ought to be continued in his monopoly, under which he has never yet given us competitive rates, and he ought to be continued in that monopoly at the expense of the American people who paid for the canal; but if it is for the benefit of the American people this amendment, which does not deprive him of one single pound of freight that he carries to-day, ought to be adopted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume the Senator does not mean to suggest that I made an appeal in behalf of the American shipbuilder, for I had nothing of that kind in mind. I had some reference to an American industry which I think we ought carefully to guard in our legislation.

Mr. PERCY. I did not mean to suggest, Mr. President, that that was the purpose of the Senator from New Hampshire. I meant to suggest, however, that that is the logical and inevitable consequence flowing from his position.

Just one other suggestion: There is not a coastwise vessel that would be deprived of a pound of freight that it carries to-day under this amendment, except the Pacific Mail and the California-Atlantic Line that ply on the western coast. They may be brought in competition with foreign shipping under the terms of the amendment, but no others. The whole question is whether an extraordinary condition, where there has been an expenditure of $400,000,000, is going to be brought to naught by care for the interests of the American shipbuilder.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to inquire if the Senator does not think that the American-Hawaiian Line should also be added to the list of lines that would be affected?

Mr. PERCY. The American-Hawaiian Line, as I now understand, handles its business across the Tehuantepec Railway nearly exclusively, and not over the Panama Railway.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; but if the Panama Canal is built, of course it will not handle its business over the Tehuantepec Railroad. Does it not affect that?

Mr. PERCY. I should say that, in my opinion, it should be affected if it could not successfully compete; but, as a matter of fact, under the verbiage of this amendment it would not be affected by it, because it simply applies to vessels plying from the Atlantic to the Pacific seaports.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator a question: I believe he was a member of the committee which reported this bill, and I should like to know if it developed in the investigation of the committee why it has happened that the railroad companies have acquired all the steamship interests on the Atlantic and practically all on the Pacific coast?

Mr. PERCY. There was a great deal of testimony and a very considerable amount of controversy developed over that question, one contention being that they had acquired it for the purpose of throttling competition with independent lines.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As affecting the transcontinental as well as interior rates and rates along the coast lines?

Mr. PERCY. The testimony developed that the Pacific Mail Co. had until within the past two or three years destroyed competition from the Pacific to the Atlantic under an arrangement with the Panama Railroad before the Government took charge of that railroad.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senator if it did not develop that the transcontinental railroad companies, by a payment of about $75,000 per month, for a great many years maintained steamships on the Pacific coast at a loss, and that through the instrumentality of those steamships were enabled to keep up the transcontinental rates?

Mr. PERCY. That was stated in the testimony.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if there is to be no further discussion upon the pending bill to-day, I ask unanimous consent that it may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there are two or three amendments submitted by the Committee on Appropriations which have been passed over. The first amendment passed over was the first amendment in the bill. I ask that it may now be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment passed over will be stated.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, which had been passed over, was, on page 2, after line 16, to insert the following:

To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenues, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production, as are authorized by said act, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes; and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, $225,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to suggest an amendment to the amendment by inserting, on page 3, line 1, after the word "act," the words "or any existing law," which makes the amendment the same as the present authority for the Tariff Board.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 1, of the proposed committee amendment, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert the words "or any existing law."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if I had my choice in the matter I should simply vote on this amendment without any remarks because the subject has been discussed here from time to time, but I am going to say a few words about the unreliability of the experts of the Tariff Board.

Mr. President, the most remarkable message ever sent to Congress was the veto message of the President of the United States of the cotton schedule, especially that part of it which criticizes the chemical amendment, because from beginning to end it is full of errors and misstatements of facts. I do not stand here to charge or even intimate that the President would willfully make misstatements or state errors. I know the President did it unintentionally, and was woefully imposed upon, but I know, and I expect to prove, so that a wayfaring man though he be a fool will understand, that the expert of the Tariff Board, upon whom the President relied, was guilty of false statements; an expert who made his calculations upon the short ton instead of the long ton, which made a difference of 10 per cent; an expert who when he had the prices laid before him in a Government publication, assumed prices to be true that were absolutely false. Therefore, with two false premises, taking for his calculation the short ton instead of the long ton, on which all these calculations are made, and also assuming the prices to be true which were absolutely false—with those two false premises—he reported to the President something that was not true and the result was a document full of false statements.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the Senator referring to the expert on the chemical bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill that was attached to the cotton bill as an amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator any objection to stating who the expert was?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am informed his name is Hernstein.

Mr. SMOOT. He is the same expert the minority members of the committee had to help them, is he not?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think he is the same one who wanted $25 a day for his services to the minority.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he was called down here from New York by the Democratic members of the Finance Committee to assist in the preparation of the chemical schedule, and, instead of drawing the regular compensation paid him by the Government, he requested a leave of absence without pay, and put in a bill to the Senate committee, as I understand, for about $25 a day.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the same Hernstein the President relied on in preparing the message he sent to Congress, for he said in that message—I am going to read a portion of it—that he did consult a chemist of the Tariff Board. We all have to rely on chemists and experts in the case of the chemical schedule, because very few of us understand it.

If the President had been familiar, as he ought to have been, with the Payne-Aldrich bill, which he said was the best tariff bill ever passed by any Congress, he would not have written what he did about the very detrimental effect, amounting almost to destruction, the passage of the chemical bill would have on the internal revenues of the country. He afterwards took back the statement as to the Payne-Aldrich law being the best tariff law ever enacted, for he sent two messages to Congress asking for a revision of the wool schedule and also of the cotton schedule.

Let us see, Mr. President, what the President said and then I will show you by three lines of the Payne-Aldrich bill that what he says is not true. A good deal of fun has been made of the chemical schedule by the President and the papers of the country. The President says in this very remarkable message:

But the most remarkable feature of this amendment to the chemical schedule remains to be stated. The internal revenues of this country to the extent of $160,000,000 are dependent on the imposition of a tax of $1.20 a gallon on distilled spirits at 100 degrees proof, which is a liquid consisting of 50 per cent absolute alcohol and 50 per cent water. The intrinsic cost of spirits of this proof varies from 10 to 20 cents a gallon, so that the enormous tax as compared with the intrinsic value of the article furnishes a motive for fraud and evasion of the law stronger than in the case of any commodity within the range of Federal taxation. It has therefore been necessary in all customs legislation to protect the internal-revenue system against the introduction from foreign countries of alcohol in any form and in association with any other article, except upon the payment of such a customs duty as shall make it unprofitable to import the alcohol into this country to be used in competition with alcohol or distilled spirits of domestic manufacture. The customs duty on a proof gallon of alcohol is $2.25. The care and anxious concern with which Congress has heretofore guarded against the introduction of alcohol in any form without the payment of sufficient duty to prevent its interfering with our domestic production and the payment of the internal tax may be seen in at least 10 paragraphs of the chemical schedule of the Payne law and previous enactments:

Thus, in paragraph 2 of the existing law it is provided that vegetable, animal, or mineral objects, immersed or placed in or saturated with alcohol shall have a duty of 60 cents per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem, and the same duty is imposed in that paragraph on alcoholic compounds not specially provided for. Sixty cents a pound is equivalent to 60 cents a pint of the alcohol or distilled spirits used at proof, and this is equivalent to $4.80 a gallon for alcohol, which, of course, prevents its importation for any purpose other than as specified in the paragraph.

Again, in paragraph 3, chemical compounds containing alcohol and chemical mixtures containing alcohol have a duty of 55 cents per pound, which would protect the domestic alcohol by a duty of $4.40 a gallon.

The same thing is true in paragraph 65, covering medicinal preparations containing alcohol, or any preparations in which alcohol is used. These have a duty of 55 cents per pound, which would impose a duty on the alcohol used of at least $4.40 a gallon.

Again, on perfumes, including cologne and other toilet waters containing alcohol or in the preparation of which alcohol is used, there is a duty of 60 cents per pound and 50 per cent ad valorem, by which the domestic alcohol used in American-made perfumes is protected by a tax of $4.80.

Under the present bill, all these precautions against the undue introduction of foreign alcohol in articles and compounds included in the chemical schedule are in fact abolished by striking out the specific duties per pound. Thus in paragraph 2, the specific duty per pound is stricken out and the whole rate is fixed at 50 per cent ad valorem. In paragraph 3, there is a similar change; in paragraph 65, the change is to 45 per cent ad valorem; and in paragraph 69, to 60 and 50 per cent ad valorem. With alcohol at a foreign cost of 20 cents a gallon, this would make the tax, so far as the alcohol is concerned in paragraph 2, 10 cents a gallon; in paragraph 3, 8 cents a gallon; in paragraph 65, 9 cents a gallon; and in paragraph 69, from 10 to 12 cents a gallon. That is, the alcohol thus introduced would pay under this chemical schedule from 8 to 12 cents a gallon duty instead of $1.20 a gallon as imposed by our internal-revenue system, or $2.25 a gallon as imposed by our customs laws upon the introduction of proof alcohol, or the higher rates as fixed in the existing chemical schedule. Alcohol is also used in the manufacture of collodion and fruit ethers, and under the existing law the invasion of our internal-revenue system is here also prevented by the imposition of high rates per pound as the equivalent of the internal-revenue tax. By this amendment the compensatory duties for the high domestic tax on alcohol in collodion and ether is abolished and if the bill passed, the domestic manufacturer would pay $1.40 a gallon for his alcohol while his importing competitor would pay but 30 cents.

I need hardly dwell on the disastrous effect such an amendment in reference to alcoholic compounds would have upon the internal-revenue system of taxing distilled spirits nor need I point out the opportunities of evasion and fraud thus presented. Of course the change was not intended, but if this bill became law, it would be made.

This bill thus illustrates and enforces the views which I have already expressed in vetoing the wool bill and the so-called free-list bill, as to the paramount importance of securing, through the investigation and reports of the Tariff Board, a definite and certain basis of ascertained fact for the consideration of tariff laws. When the reports of the Tariff Board upon these schedules are received, the duties which should be imposed can be determined upon justly, and with intelligent appreciation of the effect that they will have both upon industry and upon revenue. Very likely some of the changes in this bill will prove to be desirable and some to be undesirable. So far as they turn out to be just and reasonable I shall be glad to approve them, but at present the proposed legislation appears to be all a matter of guesswork. The important thing is to get our tariff legislation out of the slough of guesswork and logrolling and ex parte statements of interested persons, and to establish that legislation on the basis of tested and determined facts, to which shall be applied, fairly and openly, whatever tariff principle the people of the country choose to adopt.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 22, 1911.

What is the answer to all of this? If the President had turned to Schedule H, which has never been amended or repealed in any respect, he would have found three lines which amply protect the internal revenues. He says that heretofore in tariff bills there have been some precautionary provisions. He failed to read that such a provision is in the existing law, and nobody ever attempted to amend it or strike it out. It is under Schedule H, "Spirits, wines, and other beverages," section 310, page 33 of the tariff act of 1909, known as the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. REED. In what bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand that the President was not referring to the Payne-Aldrich bill, but was referring to the chemical bill, which was passed as an amendment to the cotton bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. The President vetoed the cotton bill. I am talking about what he said in his veto message to the effect that the amendment to the chemical schedule attached to the cotton bill would destroy the internal revenue of the country, and I am going to show that if he had been familiar with the Payne-Aldrich bill he would have known that there was a provision incorporated in that bill prohibiting any distilled spirits being shipped into this country under the chemical schedule, which was then and is still the law.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, providing that the Payne-Aldrich bill was in force, but if the cotton bill had been approved by the President, with the chemical schedule amendment attached, then that would have repealed the existing tariff law affecting chemicals.

Mr. OVERMAN. Ah, Mr. President, there was involved no repeal of the provision in the Payne-Aldrich bill to which I have referred. The cotton schedule was one section; the chemical schedule was another, and Schedule H is untouched and unamended. Now, I said I would prove in three lines that everything he said was misleading. Listen to this complete answer to all the President said upon this point. Paragraph 302 of the existing tariff law reads as follows:

302. On all compounds or preparations of which distilled spirits are a component part of chief value there shall be levied a duty not less than that imposed upon distilled spirits.

Can anything be plainer than that?

And yet he states to the country that the chemical bill would destroy our revenues.

Now, what else? I have employed two of the best experts in America. I sent for an expert who assisted Mr. Aldrich in the preparation of the Dingley bill, the McKinley bill, and the Payne-Aldrich bill. I sent for another expert, and also sent for a New York chemist. They have gone over my amendment and the President's message, and I have the results of their investigation in parallel columns—what the President says being placed on one side and what is the truth on the other—and the statement shows that every word he said about the increases or decreases under the proposed amendment of the chemical schedule was untrue.

As I have said, when I desired to prepare an amendment to the chemical schedule to be offered in the Senate to the cotton schedule, I had an expert make out the schedule for me. I offered it, and it was adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives. I took the President's message and submitted it to an expert, and, without knowledge on his part that I was going to do so, I submitted it to another expert, and, without any collaboration or acting together, without any knowledge that the other was acting upon it, the reports of the two experts coincide exactly. I also had the expert chemist examine their statements, and he approved both, showing what the President says on one side and what is the truth on the other, according to the two experts and according to the chemist, who came here from New York, and who is one of the leading chemists of the country. He has written opposite every item "correct" or "O. K." as to the amendment I introduced and "incorrect" as to what the President says in regard to those items.

I will read an extract from the statement:

In the examination of this act, referred to on page 5 of the message of the President, the conclusions drawn by the expert chemist of the Tariff Board are based upon assumptions. He assumes a foreign market price, applies the proposed ad valorem rate, and compares the result with the present law. The actual import prices are given officially in the report on Commerce and Navigation, by the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce and Labor.

The expert who assisted the President did not take the prices as furnished by this Government publication.

The computations of the proposed rates upon Schedule A in H. R. 12812, based upon the method used, were not inaccurate or faulty. In fact, not a single inaccuracy or error has been pointed out by the expert chemist, while the results obtained by him are shown below in a parallel column with the real facts.

The expert who assisted the President says this:

Boracic acid is duitable under the present law at 3 cents per pound. The amendment imposes a duty of 60 per cent ad valorem. At the foreign price of 6 to 6½ cents per pound the amended rate would be from 3.6 to 3.9 cents per pound, or an actual increase in the duty under the present law of from 20 to 30 per cent.

That is what the President says. Here is the report of a chemist and two experts. What do they say?

The average import price of boracic acid for the period August 5, 1909, to June 30, 1910, was 3.2 cents per pound (see p. 953, Commerce and Navigation for 1910); a duty of 60 per cent based upon this value would be 1.92 cents per pound, a reduction of 36 per cent.

The President, basing his statement upon information given by the Tariff Board experts, says it would have been an increase.

The average import price for 1911 (p. 951, Commerce and Navigation for 1911) was 3.7 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 2.2 cents per pound, or a reduction of 26 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator referred to the Statistical Abstract to prove that boracic acid could be purchased for 3$\frac{1}{10}$ cents per pound?

Mr. OVERMAN. Here is a statement of the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate on "Schedule A, duties on chemicals, oils, and paints," and if the Senator will examine the statement I have here and go over it himself and make his calculations he will see that the expert is right, because the Senator is an expert himself.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason that I doubted that, Mr. President, was on account of the prices stated, for I know what the price of boracic acid is.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will see the prices quoted there just as they are in this statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I know from actual experience what the prices are, but I will examine the statement and call the Senator's attention to it later.

Mr. OVERMAN. The President said:

Tartaric acid under the amendment has a duty of 4 per cent higher than that of the existing law.

Is that true? Here is what the experts say about it:

Present rate on tartaric acid is 5 cents per pound; proposed rate, 20 per cent ad valorem. Average price 1910, 17.8 cents per pound; average price 1911, 21.8 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 3.56 cents for 1910 and 4.36 cents for 1911, a reduction of 29 and 13 per cent, respectively.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going to take the time to read this entire statement, but the two experts to whom I have referred have taken up every single item, and their conclusions have been approved by the New York chemist, who has written in the margin, as you can see, "Correct" or "O. K." or "Incorrect." I ask that this statement be printed in the RECORD, including the marks "Incorrect," "Correct," and so forth, as indicated. The statements, it will be seen, are both made out in parallel columns—what the President said in one column and the truth in the other column—where he committed error upon misinformation from the Tariff Board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The statement referred to is as follows:

As regards Schedule A, H. R. 12812 undertakes to reduce the present rates about 25 per cent. Owing to fluctuating prices this exact reduction can not remain constant, but is only an average rate of reduction.

Some rates of duty are barely changed—where they are already low—while upon others the reduction is greater than 25 per cent.

In the examination of this act, referred to on page 5 of the message of the President, the conclusions drawn by the expert chemist of the Tariff Board are based upon assumptions. He assumes a foreign-market price, applies the proposed ad valorem rate, and compares the result with the present law. The actual import prices are given officially in the report on commerce and navigation, by the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce and Labor.

The computations of the proposed rates upon Schedule A in H. R. 12812, based upon the method used, were not inaccurate or faulty. In fact, not a single inaccuracy or error has been pointed out by the expert chemist, while the results obtained by him are shown below in a parallel column with the real facts.

	President said in his message.	Actual facts.
5 Incorrect.	Boracic acid is dutiable under the present law at 3 cents per pound. The amendment imposes a duty of 60 per cent ad valorem. At the foreign price of 6 to 6¼ cents per pound the amended rate would be from 3.6 to 3.9 cents per pound, or an actual increase in the duty under the present law of from 20 to 30 per cent.	The average import price of boracic acid for the period August 5, 1909, to June 30, 1910, was 3.2 cents per pound (see p. 953, Commerce and Navigation for 1910); a duty of 60 per cent based upon this value would be 1.92 cents per pound, a reduction of 36 per cent.	√ O. K.
		The average import price for 1911 (p. 951, Commerce and Navigation for 1911) was 3.7 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 2.2 cents per pound, or a reduction of 26 per cent.	√
9 Incorrect.	Tartaric acid under the amendment has a duty 4 per cent higher than that of the existing law.	Present rate on tartaric acid is 5 cents per pound; proposed rate, 20 per cent ad valorem. Average price, 1910, 17.8 cents per pound; average price, 1911, 21.8 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 3.56 cents for 1910 and 4.36 cents for 1911, a reduction of 29 and 13 per cent, respectively.	O. K. O. K.
20 Incorrect.	Alum under the amendment has a rate 10 per cent higher than the existing law.	Present rate on alum is one-fourth of 1 cent or three-eighths of 1 cent per pound, depending upon purity. Proposed rates, 20 per cent or 30 per cent, respectively. Value in 1910, 0.8 cent and 0.9 cent, respectively, equivalent to a proposed rate of 0.16 and 0.27 cent per pound. In 1911 the prices were 1 cent and 0.9 cent per pound, equivalent to a proposed rate of 0.20 and 0.27 cent per pound. These are all reductions from the present law.	O. K. O. K.
29	Bleaching powder has a rate under the amendment that is 30 per cent higher than the existing rate.	Present rate on bleaching powder is one-fifth cent per pound. Proposed rate is 20 per cent ad valorem. Value in 1910, also in 1911, was 0.8 cent per pound, equivalent to a proposed rate of 0.16 cent per pound, a reduction of 20 per cent.	O. K. O. K.
96 Incorrect.	Zinc oxide has an increase of rate in the amendment of 95 per cent over the existing law.	Present rate on zinc oxide, dry, 1 cent per pound; ground in oil, 1¾ cents per pound. Proposed rates, 10 per cent and 15 per cent, respectively. Value, 1910, 5.7 cents and 9.1 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 0.57 and 1.365 cents per pound, a reduction of 43 per cent and 22 per cent, respectively. The figures for 1911 are reductions of 37 per cent and 38 per cent, respectively.	O. K. O. K.
32	Borax is given a rate in the amendment which is a reduction of 80 per cent below the existing rate.	The present rate upon borax is 2 cents per pound. The proposed duty is 10 per cent. Value, 1910 (p. 955, Commerce and Navigation, 1910), 17 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 1.7 cents per pound, a reduction of 15 per cent. Based upon the 1911 value, 0.108, the reduction would be 46 per cent.	O. K. O. K.
35 Incorrect.	Commercial chloroform has a reduction of 90 per cent from the present rate.	The present rate upon chloroform is 10 cents per pound. The proposed duty is 5 per cent ad valorem. The value for 1910 (p. 955, Commerce and Navigation for 1910), was $1.54 per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 7.7 cents per pound, a reduction of 23 per cent. Based upon the value for 1911, $1.76, the reduction would be 12 per cent.	O. K. O. K.
128	Hydrate of or caustic soda is given a rate in the amendment which is a 50 per cent reduction from the present rate.	The present rate upon hydrate of or caustic soda is one-half cent per pound. The proposed rate is 12 per cent. Value 1910 (p. 961, Commerce and Navigation for 1910), 3.2 cents per pound; 12 per cent thereof is .384 cent per pound, a reduction of 0.23+ per cent. Value 1911, 2.5 cents per pound. Equivalent rate, 3 cents per pound, a reduction of 40 per cent.	O. K. O. K.
20	A curious result appears in the rate fixed for alumina hydrate containing less than 64 per cent of alumina, and the same containing more of alumina. The latter is a finished product as compared with the former, but the latter in the amendment is given a duty of only 5 per cent, while the raw and unfinished product has a rate of 15 per cent ad valorem.	The present rate on alumina hydrate containing not more than 64 per cent alumina is 0.4 cent per pound. Proposed rate is 15 per cent. Value, 1910 (p. 955, Commerce and Navigation for 1910), 1.6 cents per pound. Equivalent rate, 0.24 cent per pound, a reduction of 40 per cent.	O. K.
		Present rate on that containing more than 64 per cent of alumina is 0.6 cent per pound. Proposed rate is 5 per cent. Value, 1910, 12.2 cents per pound. Equivalent rate, 0.61 cent per pound reduction, a slight increase; that is, the proposed rates are less curious than the present rates.	O. K.
Page 10, bill.	In paragraph 2 the specific duty per pound is stricken out, and the whole rate is fixed at 50 per cent ad valorem. In paragraph 3 there is a similar change. In paragraph 65 the change is to 45 per cent ad valorem.
Page 13, bill.	In paragraph 69 the change is to 60 and 50 per cent ad valorem.
Page 14, bill.	With alcohol at a foreign cost of 20 cents per gallon this would make the tax, so far as the alcohol is concerned, in paragraph 2, 10 cents per gallon.	In paragraph 2 the proposed rate on all other alcoholic compounds is 50 per cent. The present law is 60 cents per pound and 25 per cent. Reduce the 25 per cent by 25 per cent leaves 18¾ per cent. That is, the alcohol pays the other 31¼ per cent, based upon import prices for 1910 (p. 955, Commerce and Navigation for 1910); this amounts to over 39 cents per pound, or over $2.50 per gallon instead of 10 cents per gallon. The price for 1911 gives over $2.10 per gallon.
	In paragraph 3, 8 cents per gallon.	PAR. 3. The proposed rate upon chemical compounds, mixtures, and salts containing alcohol, or in the preparation of which alcohol is used, not specially provided for, is 40 per cent ad valorem. The present law is 55 cents per pound, but not less than 25 per cent ad valorem. The import price for 1910 (p. 963, Commerce and Navigation for 1910) was 89.5 cents per pound; 40 per cent of this is 35.8 cents per pound, the proposed rate. This is equivalent to over $2.30 per gallon.
	In paragraph 65, 9 cents per gallon.	PAR. 65. The proposed rate upon medical preparations containing alcohol, or in the preparation of which alcohol is used, not specially provided for, is 45 per cent ad valorem. The present rate is 55 cents per pound, but not less than 25 per cent ad valorem. The import price for 1910 (p. 965, Commerce and Navigation for 1910) was 89.1 cents per pound. The equivalent rate proposed is 45 per cent of this, or 40.095 cents, or over $2.60 per gallon.

President said in his message.	Actual facts.
In paragraph 69, 10 cents to 12 cents per gallon.	Paragraph 69 relates to soaps. This is evidently a mistake, and is intended for 67. The present law, paragraph 67, provides the following rate: Perfumery, including cologne and other toilet waters, articles of perfumery, whether in sachets or otherwise, and all preparations used as applications to the hair, mouth, teeth, or skin, such as cosmetics, dentifrices, including tooth soaps, pastes, including theatrical grease paints and pastes, pomades, powders, and other toilet articles, all the foregoing, if containing alcohol, or in the manufacture of which alcohol is used, 60 cents per pound and 50 per cent ad valorem. The proposed duty on the above is 60 per cent. If the ad valorem part of the present rate is reduced 25 per cent, 37½ per cent is left for the proposed rate, which, taken from 60 per cent, leaves 22½ per cent as the duty on alcohol. The price in 1910 (p. 1065, Commerce and Navigation for 1910) was $2.83 per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate on the alcohol of 63.67 cents per pound, or over $4.10 per gallon.
Page 11 bill. By this amendment the compensatory duties for the high domestic tax on alcohol in collodion and ether (fruit ethers) is abolished, and if the bill should pass the domestic manufacturer would pay $1.40 per gallon for his alcohol, while his importing competitor would pay but 30 cents.	Paragraph 21 gives the present rate on fruit ethers as $1 per pound. The proposed rate is 100 per cent ad valorem. The value in 1910 (p. 957, Commerce and Navigation for 1910) was 77.5 cents per pound. The proposed equivalent rate would be 77.5 cents per pound, or over $5 per gallon. Paragraph 17 gives the present rate on collodion and all compounds of pyroxylin or other cellulose esters 40 cents per pound. The proposed rate is 35 per cent ad valorem. The price for 1910 (p. 967, Commerce and Navigation for 1910) was 74 cents per pound, equivalent to a proposed rate of 25.9 cents per pound. If this were all alcohol it would be equivalent to a duty of about $1.70 per gallon.

NOTE.—The alcohol contained in all mixtures and compounds referred to in Schedule A is incidental in value to the other component materials thereof.

Schedule H, paragraph 302, specifies that "On all compounds or preparations of which distilled spirits are a component part of chief value there shall be levied a duty not less than that imposed upon distilled spirits." This paragraph was not changed nor was it intended to be changed by H. R. 12812; therefore the question of alcohol is entirely eliminated.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is one statement. Now I ask to have published the results of the examination of another expert.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Some of the erroneous statements contained in the President's veto message of August 22, 1911, accompanying the bill H. R. 12812.

The President says.	The facts show.
BORACIC ACID.
Boracic acid is dutiable under the present law at 3 cents a pound. The amendment imposes a duty of 60 per cent ad valorem. At the foreign price of 6 to 6½ cents per pound, the amended rate would be 3.6 to 3.9 cents per pound, or an actual increase in the duty under the present law of from 20 to 30 per cent.	The average import price of boracic acid for the period August 5, 1909, to June 30, 1910, was 3.2 cents per pound (see p. 953, Commerce and Navigation for 1910); a duty of 60 per cent based upon this value would be 1.92 cents per pound, a reduction of 36 per cent. The average import price for 1911 (p. 951, Commerce and Navigation for 1911) was 3.7 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 2.2 cents per pound, or a reduction of 26 per cent.
TARTARIC ACID.
Tartaric acid under the amendment has a duty 4 per cent higher than that of the existing law.	Present rate on tartaric acid is 5 cents per pound; proposed rate, 20 per cent ad valorem. Average price 1910, 17.8 cents per pound; average price 1911, 21.8 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 3.56 cents for 1910 and 4.36 cents for 1911, a reduction of 29 and 13 per cent, respectively.
ALUM.
Alum under the amendment has a rate of 10 per cent higher than the existing law.	Present rate on alum is one-fourth of 1 cent or three-eighths of 1 cent per pound, depending upon purity. Proposed rates, 20 per cent or 30 per cent, respectively. Value in 1910, 0.8 cent and 0.9 cent, respectively, equivalent to a proposed rate of 0.16 and 0.27 cent per pound. In 1911 the prices were 1 cent and 0.9 cent per pound, equivalent to a proposed rate of 0.20 and 0.27 cent per pound. These are all reductions from the present law.
BLEACHING POWDER.
Bleaching powder has a rate under the amendment that is 30 per cent higher than the existing rate.	Present rate on bleaching powder is one-fifth of 1 cent a pound. Proposed rate is 20 per cent ad valorem. Value in 1910, also in 1911, was 0.8 cent per pound, equivalent to a proposed rate of 0.16 cent per pound, a reduction of 20 per cent.
ZINC OXIDE.
Zinc oxide has an increase of rate in the amendment of 95 per cent over the existing law.	Present rate on zinc oxide, dry, 1 cent per pound; ground in oil, 1½ cents per pound. Proposed rates, 10 per cent and 15 per cent, respectively. Value, 1910, 5.7 cents and 9.1 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 0.57 and 1.365 cents per pound, a reduction of 43 per cent and 22 per cent, respectively. The figures for 1911 are reductions of 37 per cent and 38 per cent, respectively.
BORAX.
Borax is given a rate in the amendment which is a reduction of 80 per cent below the existing rate.	The present rate upon borax is 2 cents per pound. The proposed duty is 10 per cent. Value, 1910 (p. 955, Commerce and Navigation, 1910), 17 cents per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 1.7 cents per pound, a reduction of 15 per cent. Based upon the 1911 value, 0.108 cent per pound, the reduction would be 46 per cent.
CHLOROFORM.
Commercial chloroform has a reduction of 90 per cent from the present rate.	The present rate upon chloroform is 10 cents per pound. The proposed duty is 5 per cent ad valorem. The value for 1910 (p. 955, Commerce and Navigation for 1910) was $1.54 per pound. This is equivalent to a proposed rate of 7.7 cents per pound, a reduction of 23 per cent. Based upon the value for 1911, $1.76 per pound, the reduction would be 12 per cent.
HYDRATE OF OR CAUSTIC SODA.
Hydrate of or caustic soda is given a rate in the amendment which is a 50 per cent reduction from the present rate.	The present rate upon hydrate of or caustic soda is one-half of 1 cent per pound. The proposed rate is 12 per cent. Value, 1910 (p. 961, Commerce and Navigation for 1910), 3.2 cents per pound; 12 per cent thereof is 0.384 cent per pound, a reduction of 23 per cent. Value 1911, 2.5 cents per pound. Equivalent rate, 3 cents per pound, a reduction of 40 per cent.

The President says.	The facts show.
HYDRATE OF OR CAUSTIC SODA—continued. A curious result appears in the rate fixed for alumina hydrate containing less than 64 per cent of alumina, and the same containing more of alumina. The latter is a finished product as compared with the former, but the latter in the amendment is given a duty of only 5 per cent, while the raw and unfinished product has a rate of 15 per cent ad valorem.	The present rate on alumina hydrate containing not more than 60 per cent alumina is .4 cent per pound. Proposed rate is 15 per cent. Value, 1910 (p. 955, Commerce and Navigation for 1910), 1.6 cents per pound. Equivalent rate. 24 cents per pound, a reduction of 40 per cent. Present rate on that containing more than 64 per cent of alumina is .6 cent per pound. Proposed rate is 5 per cent. Value in 1910, 12.2 cents per pound. Equivalent rate, .61 cent per pound, a slight increase. That is, the proposed rates are less curious than the present rates.

NOTE.—The figures used in the President's message upon which ad valorem percentages and equivalents are computed can not be found in any official document.

The figures upon which the President's statements are shown to be inaccurate will be found in the official reports on Commerce and Navigation, Department of Commerce and Labor.

Since Schedule H, paragraph 302, which specifies that "on all compounds or preparations of which distilled spirits are a component part of the chief value there shall be levied a duty not less than that imposed upon distilled spirits," was not changed or intended to be changed by H. R. 12812, the question, therefore, of alcohol is entirely eliminated.

Mr. OVERMAN. That paper shows some of the erroneous statements contained in the President's veto message of August 22, 1911, accompanying the bill H. R. 12812. I will call attention to one of the paragraphs of that statement. The President says:

A curious result appears in the rate fixed for alumina hydrate containing less than 64 per cent of alumina and the same containing more of alumina. The latter is a finished product as compared with the former, but the latter in the amendment is given a duty of only 5 per cent, while the raw and unfinished product has a rate of 15 per cent ad valorem.

That is what the President says. The facts show—

The present rate on alumina hydrate containing not more than 60 per cent alumina is 0.4 cent per pound. Proposed rate is 15 per cent. Value, 1910 (p. 955, Commerce and Navigation for 1910), 1.6 cents per pound. Equivalent rate 0.24 cent per pound, a reduction of 40 per cent.

Present rate on that containing more than 64 per cent of alumina is 0.6 cent per pound. Proposed rate is 5 per cent. Value in 1910, 12.2 cents per pound. Equivalent rate 0.61 cent per pound, a slight increase; that is, the proposed rates are less curious than the present rates.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator in submitting the report of the expert give his name?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not, because I am afraid people will turn him out.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, I do not think there will be any inclination to turn anybody out; in fact, I do not think that we could do so if we wanted to.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows him and has used him on the wool bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not objecting to the report; it may be absolutely correct, but I simply ask the question whether the expert's name is attached to the report.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not like to mention his name, but I will tell the Senator privately. I will say, however, that the Senator has used him in connection with the wool bill at this session, I think.

I want to say, Mr. President, whether that is so or not, that those two experts in different places, not knowing that the other man was engaged on the work, agree that the amendment to the chemical schedule was a reduction, and that everything the President said in his veto message regarding it was a misstatement of the facts, as shown by the results of their investigations placed in parallel columns with the statements of the President, as I asked them to do. Now, how could two experts not acting together agree so perfectly unless the facts were plain?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. REED. I merely want to say, for the purpose of getting the truth, that those of us who were not on the Finance Committee are more interested in knowing now whether the Senator from Utah disputes the findings of this expert than we are in the name of the expert, and I should like to know whether he does dispute it.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me call the Senator's attention to one item referred to by him. Take tartaric acid.

Mr. REED. That is the item the Senator from North Carolina referred to.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the item to which he referred.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. If we take the importation price for the year 1910, then the expert is correct; but if we take the importation price for 1909, the expert who gave the President the information is correct. I call the attention of the Senator to that fact, and I will ask him if it is not true, for this reason: In 1909 the average price of tartaric acid was 30.6 cents per pound, and the average price for 1910, the very next year, upon which this report is based—and I take it for granted that the report made to the President was based upon 1909——

Mr. REED. Why does the Senator take it for granted?

Mr. SMOOT. The price is 16.5 cents, or nearly one-half difference in the price.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why do you take it for granted?

Mr. SMOOT. Let me finish.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will.

Mr. SMOOT. While I will admit that if I had been giving the President the information he asked for and if I had been reporting this case to the President I would have taken the price of the last year's importation, whoever made the report and gave the information to the President did not take that price, but took the 1909 price.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator misstates it. He takes 1910 and 1911, showing he was fair. That was better than what the chemist of the Tariff Board did—take the figures of 1909.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not gone further back than 1909. Now take the following year; but the same principle would apply in both cases. I will say frankly, as the Senator knows, that that is how it happened, and I believe he will admit that the statement I have made is correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think this is the expert employed by the Tariff Board, and I started out with the statement that those experts are unreliable. People say figures do not lie, but some experts take figures and assume false prices calculated upon false premises and report facts wholly without foundation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. REED. If I can interrupt this Rooseveltian language for a moment——

Mr. OVERMAN. That is an old, familiar expression. I do not say anybody has lied. I know the President would not lie, and I know that the President would not make a misstatement, but he could be misinformed.

Mr. REED. I think we will all agree that the President would not make a willful misstatement.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course.

Mr. REED. I think all Democrats would agree to that, but I do not know how our friends on the other side may feel about it. But what I am interested in is the position of the Senator from Utah. How does he know that the figures used by the President were based upon 1909? Is that a mere inference, or has the Senator figured it out and found that to be the result?

Mr. SMOOT. If anyone who knows anything about it will take the figures presented by me and listen to the figures which the Senator from North Carolina reported, he will know immediately that it was the year 1909.

Mr. OVERMAN. Provided you make it on the short ton instead of the long ton, which the Senator knows makes a difference of 10 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no dispute between the Senator from North Carolina and myself on that point. The only difference is that the statement handed to the President was made upon the prices of 1909, and the statement that is made now by the Senator from North Carolina is based upon the prices of 1910.

Mr. SHIVELY. It was upon the wrong year and the wrong ton.

Mr. SMOOT. Not the wrong year, but a different year.

Mr. SHIVELY. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I would have taken an average, but that was not done in the case of the information given to the President. The information was given to the President based on the year 1909.

Mr. BACON. How does the Senator justify that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Utah does not justify it. The Senator himself has been candid and fair enough here to state that if the President had asked him to criticize this amendment, which I introduced to the cotton schedule, he would have made his calculation upon the long ton, and he would have taken the prices of 1910 and would not have gone back to 1909 and based the figures on the short ton.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. What I wanted to ask is this: Is it manifest upon the face that the year 1909 was used as the basis?

Mr. OVERMAN. There is nothing in the message or report to show it.

Mr. REED. Do they in fact refer to that year?

Mr. OVERMAN. No. If you take the short ton and take the figures of 1909, you might work out a schedule like this chemist did.

Mr. REED. Have you worked it out?

Mr. OVERMAN. No. The schedule which I introduced was worked out on the prices as they were at the time—1910; and the calculations were made upon the long ton. Then the President proceeds to say that instead of decreasing the tariff it had been increased on certain things. When the proper schedule is made, it is made at the prices of 1910 and 1911.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not quite catch what I meant, and I am very much interested in this point. I will make a statement which will perhaps make my thought clearer.

Of course, if these experts had stated fairly "These figures are based upon the prices of 1909," there would have been at least perfect frankness upon the face of it; and what I want to know is whether they did that or whether they simply gave us some conclusions without advising us what year they used as a basis.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; they did not. The President announced in his message as a fact that on certain articles instead of there being a decrease there was an increase.

Mr. REED. And he does not tell us——

Mr. OVERMAN. He does not. We can judge by taking the prices that the expert has gone and assumed prices that were not the true prices, and has made figures based upon the short ton instead of the long ton, and has imposed upon the President.

Mr. REED. One thing further. Has either the Senator from North Carolina or the Senator from Utah actually taken the figures of 1909 and ascertained whether they do produce the real results—the results as the President gave them to us—or are they simply inferring that the 1909 figures, being nearer that result, the experts went to that year?

Mr. OVERMAN. All I can say is that I do not know what table he took. I know that the chemist assumed to be true prices that were not true, and that he made his calculation upon the short ton instead of the long ton.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator from North Carolina does not concede the correctness of the statement of the Senator from Utah——

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. That the 1909 figures were taken, and that the conclusion was correct if you start from the figures of 1909.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what the Senator from Utah said.

Mr. REED. I understand. The Senator from Utah is inferring that, not stating that he has figured it out by actual calculation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I expect the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. I took it for granted from the fact that the price was 32 cents in 1909 and 16 cents in the year 1910, a difference of one-half. The report made by the Senator shows about that difference. So I take it for granted that is what the two experts did.

Mr. REED. That is what I am trying to get at—whether he did take it for granted or is stating it as the result of a calculation?

Mr. SMOOT. It is the result of a calculation, but I can not say, because I never asked the President or never asked the expert whether he used the figures of 1909. But the figures are there, and I do not believe any expert would have told the President a thing absolutely untrue. With the year 1909 as the basis of the price of tartaric acid, it would bring it within a fraction of a cent of the report made to the President.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says he does not believe any expert would tell the President an untruth. The Senator has admitted here that the expert has imposed upon the President.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is true; but in this particular case——

Mr. REED. I think it is important, and I should like to have it appear here clearly that these figures are now admitted to be false.

Mr. SMOOT. Not that.

Mr. REED. And the Senator from Utah does not mean to say that he knows of his own knowledge or by calculation that the figures of 1909 were used, and I do not think we can take anything for granted when we are dealing with gentlemen who went back, if they did go back, two or three years of time to find a basis that would suit the result they wanted to arrive at and where the price was greater, because that in itself was such an act either of stupidity or dishonesty, if it occurred, so that discredit and doubt must be thrown upon all their deductions.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield gladly.

Mr. LIPPITT. I wanted to call attention briefly to the situation of these figures for the different years. The figures for the year 1911 have been issued only within a month or two. These figures are made up until July 1 of each year. The Senator from North Carolina a minute ago said the President could have used the figures of 1911.

Mr. OVERMAN. Nineteen hundred and ten, I meant to say.

Mr. LIPPITT. As a matter of fact, he did say 1911.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Missouri just a minute ago said that the expert had gone back two or three years. He certainly did not go back two or three years, because in using the figures of 1909 he used the latest figures, in all probability, that he had at his disposal. If he was making up those figures to-day, at this minute, and he went back to the figures of 1909, he would have had available all the figures of 1910 and 1911; but it is manifest that a year ago he could not have gone back one or two years, because at the utmost he had only the figures of 1910. As I say, those figures are not issued, as a rule, until late in the spring.

Mr. REED. He certainly went back one year, and while the figures may not have been printed, the Senator will not say that the department is so far in arrears that he could not have had access to the figures of 1910 when he reported to the President.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think in all probability the expert took the figures that were in the reports published by the committee in regard to this schedule which were made up early last spring, and which were based, for the most part, on the figures of 1909, and that in reporting to the President he used the same sets of figures that had generally been used in the discussion of this subject in the House and in the Senate.

So when the Senator from North Carolina says that this expert made false statements, I do not think that is just exactly the expression that should be applied to him. Certainly if the application of this duty to the figures of 1909 are correctly enforced they are not in any sense false. It may be that the figures applied to the importations of some other year would give a different result, but that is an entirely different proposition from saying that the figures correctly applied to the importations of 1909 are false.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that a man would be doing his just duty to the President of the United States and his country in making a calculation upon the short ton instead of the long ton?

Mr. LIPPITT. Not if he did it willfully and if it should have been a long ton.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. Excuse me. You asked me a question, and I should like to answer it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

Mr. LIPPITT. That is something I know nothing about in this particular case, and of course I can not answer that, because I had not had an opportunity to investigate and look it up.

Mr. OVERMAN. In answer to the Senator from Rhode Island, I will say the expert who made out this amendment for me had the facts before him, and he took them from the official documents, and the experts who have prepared these statements took them from the same document; and if the Tariff Board did not have those prices that is another argument that they are unreliable experts and are not to be trusted.

I want to publish as a part of my remarks, at the proper place, what the President says in his message about the destruction of the revenue, and also as to the incorrect statements as to matters contained in the chemical amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. OVERMAN. The experts may all be wrong, but the President ought not to have been misled by the law itself, and he devotes most of his message to the statement that there will be a destruction of the revenues of the country, when, if he had turned over two or three pages, he would have found a provision which was put there as a guard against any measure that would destroy the revenues of the Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to inquire whether this information was furnished to the President by the Tariff Board or by some outside expert. Can the Senator from Utah inform us?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not in possession of knowledge that would enable me to say from what source the President received that information. The only intimation I have ever received upon the subject has been received to-day, by the Senator from North Carolina, with respect to the sources from which the President received the information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would ask the Senator from North Carolina whether this information was furnished to the President by the Tariff Board, as a board, or furnished by some expert?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no information as to that. I have heard that the man who made out the report is the same man who made the schedule for the Democratic minority. The Senator says so; I do not know. His name is Hernstein.

Mr. SMOOT. I do know that Mr. Hernstein was engaged by the minority members of the Senate Finance Committee for the purpose of going over the chemical schedule, and I know he was in communication with those interested in the chemical schedule and in defense of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield if the Senator merely wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. BORAH. Am I to understand that the same expert furnished different statements for the majority and the minority parties in the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I understand he was instrumental at least in defending the Democratic chemical bill that they presented to this body and which was defeated by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. If that is true, I wonder if he could not be obtained to produce a statement for the bull moose party. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRISTOW. I understood the Senator from Nevada to inquire if this expert was employed by the Tariff Board or by the Treasury Department or in some other capacity.

Mr. OVERMAN. He was employed by the Tariff Board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please address the Chair and get permission before interrupting the Senator entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. When the minority members employed Mr. Hernstein he was employed in the customs office at New York.

Mr. BRISTOW. And not by the Tariff Board?

Mr. SMOOT. He was not in the employ of the Tariff Board at that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at that time, but I learn he was at the time when the President said he sent to the Tariff Board to get an expert; and he is the same man. They may have gotten rid of him after he made this statement.

Mr. BRISTOW. The result of the argument is that an incompetent, unreliable man is employed somewhere in the Government service. He ought to be gotten out. But I can not see that that is an objection to employing men who are competent to obtain information intended for Congress or for the President.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will understand——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say that I made the inquiry regarding this expert, because I have personal knowledge of three of the members of this board. I have a very high opinion of them, and I was unwilling to believe that they could either intentionally or unintentionally be guilty of an imposition upon the President. It now appears that the expert relied upon was in the employ of the customs service in New York.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; not at that time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. He had been.

Mr. OVERMAN. He was the chemical expert for the Tariff Board when he made out this statement.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And that he was a chemical expert of the board at that time, and that he had been in the customs service in New York. Subsequently he was called upon for expert services by the Democratic minority.

Now, under those conditions, I am not inclined to hold the Tariff Board to any serious responsibility regarding this imposition upon the President, whether intentional or unintentional. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether the appropriation asked for or granted in the amendment in the sundry civil bill offered by the committee is the same as it was last year.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that it is exactly the amount.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Can the Senator state how many employees there are connected with the Tariff Board?

Mr. WARREN. The Tariff Board, as the Senator knows, has five members and a secretary, or had that number; and as to the employees, I think the number has varied up and down according to the work that was given it. For instance, when we in the sundry civil bill instructed that wool and woolens should be the first products reported upon, they sent experts abroad, and sent them all over the field in this country. When that work was completed, then that class of men were largely discharged and certain others hired. So I think they went all the way from half a dozen up to perhaps a hundred.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the question which we wish to consider is, it seems to me, entirely a nonpartisan one, and that is whether there is any necessity, in the first place, of having a board of experts to make inquiries regarding foreign and domestic production and trade, and give either the President or Congress, or both, information relating thereto; and in the second place, whether, having created an organization of this kind, now in existence for about three years, we should suddenly, when we are in the very midst of tariff revision and tariff reform, destroy that organization, discharge every employee, and leave the information which we have collected in the shape of statistics and reports to be scattered to the four winds, and the accumulated experience of such an organization to be unavailable in the future.

It seems to me that that is a nonpartisan question. The Democratic Party hopes to come into power at the next election. One of its first duties will be the revision of the tariff. The Democratic Party has never acted in a revision of the tariff without the aid of experts. The Democratic minority in this body has employed experts throughout this entire inquiry; has availed itself of Government experts, the experts of the customhouse of New York; has availed itself of the Tariff Board experts, recognizing the fact that these experts are for the most part scientists, statisticians—not partisans. If, then, the Democratic Party is to act in revision with the aid of experts, why destroy the accumulations that have been gained during the past few years? Why refuse to accept the benefit of the information and the experience that have been accumulated by this board and its employees during the past three years?

You may object to the personnel of the board—five members, three Republicans and two Democrats. Very well. If Wilson comes into power he can change the board in whole or in part, for they have no certain tenure of office. They are there at the pleasure of the President, and he can change them, and this change can be accomplished without entirely disorganizing the force of scientists, economists, and statisticians who have been engaged in this great work.

This Tariff Board has been an evolution. When we were framing the Payne-Aldrich bill we endeavored in the Senate to provide for a tariff board, and the provision had the support of some Democrats. The conference committee juggled with that provision and brought it back in its present state, making it a board advisory to the President with reference to the maximum and minimum clause of the tariff act, and we recall that when the conferees were questioned regarding the meaning of the changed provision the two great leaders of the Republican Party differed as to the interpretation which was to be put upon the conference report, Senator Hale absolutely insisting that the very purpose of the conferees was to do away with the tariff board which the Senate had in contemplation and Senator Aldrich contending, on the other hand, that the provision in the conference report was an enlargement of the powers originally imposed upon that board by the action of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator think that this ought to be a board reporting to Congress?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I should be glad to have an amendment put in this appropriation bill to that effect.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will recall, if he will pardon me, that the original purpose of the board, if I recollect correctly, was to furnish the President with information under which he could correctly judge as to how he should proceed in the application of the new provision of law which provided for a maximum and a minimum tariff. I presume that it was almost entirely, if I recollect aright, limited to that; and there was the provision that they should report to the President. But if the office to be performed by this board is to gather information which will be an assistance in the enactment of tariff laws, then the board ought, undoubtedly, to report to and be subject to Congress.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Undoubtedly; it should be an administrative board.

Mr. BACON. I would suggest further, in response to a side suggestion to me of the Senator from Missouri, that the board ought to be provided for by law in such a way as not to be subjected to the arbitrary rule of the President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It ought to be selected by Congress.

Mr. BACON. It ought either to be selected by Congress or there ought to be such a provision of law as that Congress should control the manner in which it would be selected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As to the suggestion that the members of the board should be selected by Congress, I must say that I do not take kindly to it.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish myself to be understood as meaning that. I qualified it, the Senator will remember. The words were suggested by some Senators who sit around me, and I used them; but I qualified them. Of course, I do not think that Congress can go into an election, and that would be the only way in which Congress could elect anybody. I think the selection ought to be provided for by law. They are officers of the United States, and they ought to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, or some provision of that sort should be made.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Georgia if he does not think that Congress could designate some of its Members to act as a tariff board?

Mr. BACON. Yes; by statute, undoubtedly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Those Members would not be paid a salary. They would do whatever they did in consideration of their salary as Senators, and they could employ the very men whom the President now employs on his so-called Tariff Board, or better ones. Then the investigation, instead of being made by an outside board, could be made by experts just as competent as the outside board, under the supervision and direction of members of the Finance Committee and members of the Ways and Means Committee. Congress undoubtedly could create such a board.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will first answer the Senator from North Carolina. I am not contending now as to the form of the board, as to who shall constitute the board, as to who shall appoint the board. I am simply contending that having a board with a large organization of experts, economists, and statisticians, and large accumulated experience and large information, it is not wise now to scatter and disorganize that organization, but that it is wise to perfect it. And when the Democratic Party comes into power, as we all believe it will, it can then turn to the question of the personnel of the board, as to whether it shall be made responsible both to Congress and the President, and also as to whether it shall be selected by the President or shall be a commission organized by Congress, consisting of Members of the Senate and the House. I will not pretend to enter into those questions now.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said that he would not consider the composition of the board. I suppose the Senator knows that when the board was originally created by a provision in the Payne-Aldrich bill it was created only for the purpose of aiding the President in the administration of the maximum and minimum clauses of that bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I had just stated that before the Senator came into the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. The powers of the board have been somewhat enlarged by provisions in the sundry civil appropriation act. The Senator must know that the controversy in this Chamber over this tariff-commission question has been waged right around that subject, which he says he does not expect to consider at all, and that is the subject of the composition of the commission.

There are many Senators who oppose a tariff commission appointed by the President upon the ground that the chief function of such a board is securing information to aid the Congress in the discharge of its constitutional function to initiate and enact tariff legislation. A commission appointed for that specific purpose ought to be a commission under the control of the legislative branch and not a commission under the control of the executive branch.

That has been the ground of opposition to the present so-called Tariff Board. This opposition was not because it was thought information could not be secured by proper investigations with the aid of experts that would be of great benefit and value in the consideration and in the framing of tariff bills. It was because Senators were unwilling to turn over to the President the selection of the members of the board and to give him control over its investigations and reports. They thought that the board ought to be composed largely of the membership of this body and of the other branch of Congress, with power on their part to employ such expert assistance as they might need and report directly to Congress. In that way the legislative branch would retain the control of matters of legislation, instead of having them turned over, in part at least, to the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I did not intend to treat lightly the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina that the powers of a tariff board should be exercised by a joint commission composed of the Members of the Senate and the House. I simply thought it unnecessary to enter into a discussion of that question now, because, obviously, we have not the majority in this body and we have not the power to enact such a provision. But we have the power to preserve an organization which has large information and vast experience on this subject, the preservation of which I regard as of great value in future work relating to the revision of the tariff.

I will say, however, in passing, that I doubt very much whether the organization of a joint committee of Members of the Senate and House will accomplish the purpose that Congress will have in view when it enters upon legislation of this kind. We will then have a Democratic President. That Democratic President will have the power of recommendation and the power of veto. Through these powers he is a part, really, of the legislative department. We will trust him. He will be here summer and winter. The executive department will be moving on in its work, and will want this information not only for tariff making but with reference to all the questions that relate to foreign trade and domestic trade.

Experience has shown in the past that it is much better to leave the organization of such a board to the executive department, enjoining, however, upon it the duty to report to Congress. We did that in the exercise of the great powers conferred upon us by the Constitution to regulate commerce. We did not create an Interstate Commerce Commission out of the joint membership of the Senate and the House. We created an administrative and an advisory commission, and trusted to it certain functions in aid of our powers and prescribed the rules under which it should act. We have saved ourselves an immense amount of labor by that wise act of legislation. We have created an efficiency of regulations such as would not have been accomplished by the manner suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. The function of regulating commerce is just as important as the function of fixing duties.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They are very different, are they not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; they are different, but both of them belong to Congress. Yet in the case of commerce we have found it highly beneficial to create a commission appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate. We have turned over to it the exercise of certain functions that belong to us, to be exercised under rules fixed by us.

Mr. President, is there anything that has been done by this board to cause us to lack confidence in it? Is there anything in the personnel of the board itself that arouses our distrust and our suspicion? At first it was a partisan board administering the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff. It was composed of three members, headed by a professor of economics at Yale, Prof. Emery, a man of the highest character and of broad attainments.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I indorse everything the Senator says in reference to those gentlemen on the board. They are splendid men. But the Senator will remember in the Winona speech the President said the figures in regard to the maximum and minimum tariff should not be given out to anybody; that they were solely for his use. What benefit would that board be to Congress or to the people of the United States if the President is going to use the information they acquire for just his own use?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In making the appropriation we could prescribe that the information should be given to Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. We could not get the figures if the President would not allow us to have them, and that is what he said at Winona in regard to the maximum and minimum tariff. He said they were for him and the public could not have them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not know what the President said with reference to the subject at Winona, but I can imagine that as the law placed upon him the duty of ascertaining certain facts and making a decision upon those facts he might claim that under the law he was the repository of the information gained. But if in this appropriation we change the law so as to make the board responsible to Congress as well as to the President and give it the power of reporting and of recommendation, if you choose, to Congress, then when he signs that bill the law taking the place of the other law will make the board responsible to Congress itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that that law was changed in 1910 in the appropriation act extending the powers of the board and increasing the membership from three to five. The original bill, as suggested by the Senator, was for the purpose of furnishing to the President information relative to the maximum and minimum provision in the tariff act of August 5, 1909, but the next year there was an amendment made to the sundry civil appropriation act increasing the board from three to five, extending their powers, and specifically requiring them to make a report—

> Including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production as are authorized by said act, * * * and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does it instruct them to report to Congress?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but it says——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well; that ought to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. It says:

> To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenues, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws.

Mr. OVERMAN. While the Senator is right about that, he will also bear in mind that we gave the President $100,000 for the purpose of ascertaining those facts; and what did he do with them? He gave them to the Secretary of State. He employed 8 or 10 officers. One of them gets $7,500, another $6,000, another $5,000, and so on. They took the $100,000 and used it in the establishment of a new bureau. Then it was that they came asking for a tariff board.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator has not got it quite right. When we created the first tariff board in the act of August 5, 1909, we appropriated $75,000 for carrying on the work imposed upon the board.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember the $100,000 the Senator refers to. That was to be used in connection with the collection of information in regard to our foreign trade.

Mr. OVERMAN. In regard to the maximum and minimum tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. And as to the whole question of the production of goods abroad and in this country and the cost of the same.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Payne-Aldrich bill says that $100,000 is for the purpose of carrying out the provision of that bill in regard to the maximum and minimum tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. The $75,000 appropriation related to the first Tariff Board. That is the act of August 5, 1909, creating this board. They were to report to the President so as to enable him to enforce the maximum and minimum clause, and in order to do that the first appropriation was $75,000. Then the next year in the sundry civil appropriation act we appropriated $250,000 and enlarged the powers of that board, and increased it from three to five members, and gave it other duties to perform; and the following year we made an appropriation for the same board and for the same purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. How much?

Mr. SMOOT. Two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator from Utah stated, in the first instance there was $75,000 appropriated in the general deficiency act. Next, there was $250,000 appropriated in the sundry civil act for 1911, with slightly different language as to powers and duties of the board. And last year there was $225,000 appropriated in the sundry civil act, and the language, after saying "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and so forth," according to the first act, says:

> And the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws—

Then it goes on to include the investigations to be made, and after that specifically states that—

> The Tariff Board, if established by law, shall make report to each House of Congress on the wool and woolen schedule not later than the first Monday in December, 1911.

That is in the act itself, so that the findings of the Tariff Board must in reality be open to Congress and to all the officers of the Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But, at all events, if there is any doubt about that, it ought to be clearly expressed in the appropriation. The board should be responsible to Congress.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. In order that we may have something substantial to go on, I ask the Senator if he will permit me to offer at this stage a substitute for the proposed committee amendment, so that it may now be read. I do not flatter myself, Mr. President, that it is perfect by any means, but it may be a basis for something better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia submits an amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the amendment of the committee and in lieu thereof to insert:

> To enable the Congress to secure needed information in the preparation of laws prescribing the duties to be levied upon imports through the employment of such persons as may be determined by the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives to be required for such purpose, $225,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment to the committee amendment or as a substitute?

Mr. BACON. Every substitute is an amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand that; but it is quite a different thing to offer it as a substitute.

Mr. BACON. Of course it is to take the place of the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I make that inquiry because it occurs to me that it might be a still greater improvement to retain the language used by the committee and incorporate the Senator's amendment with it.

Mr. BACON. The two are not consistent; we have got to have one or the other.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So long as we are paying for this information, it seems to me we might utilize it, not only for the benefit of Congress, but also for the benefit of the President.

Mr. BACON. Everything that is reported to Congress is published and the President has the advantage of it. There is no secret information that Congress has, except matters which relate to the executive business of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. As I understood, the proposed substitute is entirely different from the committee amendment, and provides for what we already have. We already have authorized and instructed the Finance Committee to spend the necessary money to secure the information needed by the committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, what I desire to do is to keep together the existing organization and not to create a new organization. That is my present purpose, and it seems to me the wise thing to do. I am not going to declare myself now either for or against the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia. I do not think it is necessary to consider it now.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I entirely agree with the Senator about that, and had it in mind in the preparation of the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It says nothing about the existing organization of the Tariff Board.

Mr. BACON. Neither does the amendment proposed by the committee. There are no such offices known to the law. These gentlemen who now constitute the Tariff Board are simply employed by the President. That is the language of the law. They are not officers of the Government, and have no place except as employees of the Executive. My idea is that they should become employees under the provisions of law, to be selected by the committees of the two Houses, and, in so far as I am concerned, as I have said to my colleagues here in private conversation before offering the amendment, I think it important, if we are going to have the services of men employed in this capacity, that we should have those who have had the advantage of this very valuable experience; and, so far as I am personally concerned. I would desire that they should be retained; but there is nothing in the amendment proposed by the committee which retains them.

It simply authorizes the President to employ somebody, the supposition being that he will employ the men who have already been engaged in the work; but he is not obliged to do so. He can employ anybody he sees fit under the present law, and for as short a time or as long a time as the appropriation will permit.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee and also to the Senator from Nevada the following amendment to the amendment to see if it would improve the paragraph: Add, after the sum $225,000 on line 4, page 3, the following:

Such officers shall report annually to Congress the results of their investigation.

That will require them to make an annual report to Congress as to what they do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, the suggestions are valuable and no doubt will be thrashed out during the debate, but I wish to confine myself as far as possible to the question of the importance of holding together in some form this organization with its accumulated information and experience. I was speaking a moment ago regarding its personnel.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada why he thinks we need information as to the cost of production and the cost of materials in levying a tariff for revenue. Why should we not depend upon the imports of the United States, their magnitude, and their value when they get here? What have we to do with the cost of production in levying a tariff for revenue?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator's question in a moment when I get through with the consideration of the personnel of the Tariff Board.

I referred to the chairman of the board, formerly a professor at Yale, not a decided partisan, according to my understanding. Then there are the two Democratic members, a selection which it seems to me ought to satisfy every Democrat of this body.

Those two Democrats are Prof. Page, professor of economics in the University of Virginia, an economist of distinction, and Mr. Howard, who served for nearly 20 years in the House of Representatives, many of whose associates are in this Chamber, all of whom will testify to his standing and character; a man who so impressed himself upon the party councils in the House of Representatives that he was listened to with a consideration and attention rarely accorded to other Members, and whose judicial quality was so high as to inspire the respect and the confidence of all the members of his party. I have only a slight acquaintance with Messrs. Sanders and Reynolds, and I am unable to speak regarding them; but here we have a majority of that board, the selection of whom reflects credit upon the President of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Nevada except to elicit his views upon this question: What is there about these men, their experience or their intelligence, either taken separately or collectively, that makes their opinion of any more value than the opinion of the Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate who have for years served upon the two great committees dealing with the tariff question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, I am not disposed at all to assert that the judgment or opinion of those men is superior to that of the gentlemen to whom the Senator from Missouri has referred. I was simply commenting upon the fact that experts are necessary; they are used by both parties. Senators and Members of the House of Representatives on these great committees find it necessary to tap the experience and the information of experts upon these subjects. That is no admission of inferiority upon their part or of personal superiority upon the part of the experts.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, that is not the question; it is not the question of the value of experts who collect the information that I am considering. The Senator has been discussing the personnel of the board, and I am directing my interrogatory to that point, not to the experts who may be employed—for they might be employed by committees of Congress—but to the personnel of the board itself. Unless the intelligence, experience, or honesty of the members of that board are superior to that of the members of these great committees of Congress, then it strikes me you have simply created an utterly useless organization, because why have these men unless they are capable of advice? And they are not capable of advice unless they possess superior intelligence, honesty, or experience.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, I am not prepared to say that the employment of one man by another as an expert is an assertion of the latter's superiority in either intelligence or integrity. Otherwise all of us who employ the brains of others would be convicted of incapacity. We all know that the most successful men in the business world are those who learn how to use the brains of others; and in utilizing the brains of others they are asserting not their inferiority but their superiority. So it is with these experts. They are employees of the Government who have the time to make these inquiries while we have not. We all realize that Congress is overburdened; we have now been in almost continuous session for four years; we all realize that our duties are increasing—the duties of correspondence, the duties of our offices, and the necessity of securing clerical aid. We all realize that our committee duties are enlarging and that our legislative duties are enlarging, and if there is one thing that is necessary for us to establish, if it could be established, it would be a division of efficiency and economy in the Congress, just such as has been established in the executive departments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Gladly.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator also think that the board has the capacity to do something, and in that respect has the advantage over the Senate?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The board has the capacity to do something; it has the time to do something; it has the experience that is necessary to enable it to do something; but it is simply an administrative board, acting as the servant of Congress, and the employment of its services is no acknowledgment of inferiority on our part, but, on the other hand, is an assertion of superiority.

Mr. President, I was referring to the personnel of the Tariff Board, because we often hear this board referred to contemptuously. I have not heard it referred to in terms of contempt in this debate, but the memory hangs about me of contemptuous references to this board as an incapable board, an inefficient board, a board that was organized for misinformation. So I have entered upon the consideration of the personnel of the board, so far as I know it; and I say that it is a board that should not arouse distrust or suspicion, but, on the contrary, that it is a board that invokes confidence and respect.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON]—if the Senator from Florida will permit me to answer the inquiry of that Senator—inquires why it is necessary to get all this information about the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home and all those various details referred to in this paragraph. I will admit that the Republican Party has established a wrong rule for the determination of the tariff, namely, that the duty should be fixed so as to cover the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, with a profit to the manufacturer added; and, of course, the Republican Party being in power when this provision was made, shaped the law with reference to ascertaining the facts according to the rule that they intended to assert; and yet those facts are available and useful, even when we come to apply the rule which the Democratic Party proposes to apply.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Democratic Party, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me to finish my answer, is committed to the doctrine of a tariff for revenue; it ignores the protective principle; it refuses to indorse the protective principle; but it realizes that protection exists to-day as a fact; that it has existed for generations; and that the industries of the country have been adjusted, in a greater or less degree, to the protective system. So, while the Democratic Party is devoted to the principle of a reduction of the tariff duties to a revenue basis, it declared, and wisely declared, in the platform of four years ago that the reduction should be a gradual one. Why gradual? Simply because it realizes that Uncle Sam, having climbed to a pinnacle, can not jump down.

If he propose to save his life, the thing to do is to slide down, and that is recognized in some form or the other in every Democratic platform which we have had for many years. We had the expression in the platform four years ago "a gradual reduction." We have in this platform the following statement:

> We recognize that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industries.

Now, then, in our inquiries are we not called upon to ascertain the facts as to whether a duty which we propose is to injure or to destroy an existing industry?

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. How are the industries to be injured or destroyed? Only in one way—by an increase of foreign importations. That is the only way.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I had hardly finished my reply.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; I will wait until he indicates that he will yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was remarking that we must ascertain whether a reduction which we propose will injure or destroy any existing industry. Now, how are they to be injured and how are they to be destroyed? Only in one way—by an increase in foreign importations. That increase may be so gradual, as the result of the reduction of duties, as not to injure or impair any existing industry.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Would we need any Tariff Board to ascertain what the imports are? We can get that information from a clerk in one of the departments.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well. If the Senator will make the importations the rule, if he will urge a law providing for a percentage reduction and providing for a cessation of the reduction when the importations of a given article increase beyond a certain percentage, then he will have a rule which can be worked. I have been urging that rule for years here, but I have not met with much response in the action of my brothers on this side of the House. I have insisted that the easiest and the best way was just to gauge the importations, make our reductions steadily by a certain percentage year after year, and then apply the brake whenever the importations were of such proportions as to threaten to impair or injure or destroy any American industry, as our platform says. If that could be done, we could perhaps do away with all these tariff boards, but there is no prospect of the Democratic Party establishing this highly sensible rule at present, though I hope it will sometime come to it.

Mr. REED. I understand the plan of the Senator from Nevada to begin by a reduction of a certain percentage each year?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Beginning with the present rates?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. REED. And taking off how much a year, 10 per cent?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Whatever percentage may be determined upon—10 per cent the first year, 5 per cent in succeeding years.

Mr. REED. If we are correct in our contention, for instance, that we pay 110 per cent duty on cheap blankets——

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. One hundred and thirty-five per cent.

Mr. BACON. One hundred and sixty-five per cent.

Mr. REED. One hundred and sixty-five per cent. We will start with that. It is 165 per cent and you take off 10 per cent the first year——

Mr. NEWLANDS. That would be very unsatisfactory.

Mr. REED. And you make these gradual reductions; we would perpetuate the gross inequalities of the present tariff for all the way from 5, we will say, to 20 years, dependent upon the scale.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Sixty years.

Mr. REED. Most of us would be dead before we would have these inequalities wiped out. I am not saying this in an unkindly criticism. I can see some philosophy on the part of the Senator's plan, but does he not think that before he begins to apply the rule of regulation, dependent upon the importations, we ought to begin by wiping out the enormities of the present system and by getting down to something like an equitable basis to start with?

Mr. NEWLANDS. My plan did not involve ignoring these excessive duties, these prohibitory duties. Nor did it prevent in any way the contemporaneous inquiry by Congress into these highly prohibitory duties and making reductions of a greater percentage than those called for by the general bill. But we have been trying for 40 years to reduce the tariff without result. Under the plan I suggest we would have an average reduction of 30 per cent in five years, and every prohibitory duty would be turned into a revenue duty. During this time we could gradually, without unduly disturbing either labor or wealth or creating serious economic disarrangements, increase income and inheritance taxes, and thus gradually shift a portion of the burden from consumption to wealth.

But right here let me say to the Senator from Alabama that if we pursue the rule fixed by our platform, and, in considering a duty of 100 per cent, we want to shave off the entire excess, which simply aids monopoly, and shave it off in such a way as to not to injure or destroy any American industry, then, necessarily, we must make an inquiry as to the cost of production at home and abroad, because otherwise we can not ascertain the exact level at which we shall shave off these excessive duties.

So that under any plan, under the plan of a gradual percentage reduction, such as I suggest, with the accompanying abolition of prohibitory and excessive duties, or a plan following simply the rule fixed in this platform, that we shall make these reductions in such a way as not to injure or destroy any legitimate industry, we must ascertain the facts.

Now, the question is whether each one of us is going to try to ascertain those facts individually or are we going to turn over the ascertainment of these facts to our committees or are we going to allow ourselves individually and our committees to avail themselves of the accumulated experience and information of experts upon this subject gained during the last three years of controversy?

Mr. BACON. I have several times risen, but only to say a word.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am going to yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. It would not have taken any time at all to have done so.

I simply want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the substitute which I have offered does not limit the inquiry in any manner to any particular investigation, except that it would have investigations which should have reference to the preparation of the tariff laws, and everything the Senator says can be done under this substitute as well as under the view the Senator from Alabama suggests. There is no limitation.

If the committees of the two Houses should wish to go into the question of production abroad as well as the quantity of importations, and the question of consumption at home and the question of production at home, all those matters are amply within the powers that would be conferred on the committee if this substitute were adopted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was simply answering the inquiry of the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As to what necessity there was for an expert board; that our plain duty was to reduce the tariff——

Mr. BACON. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that if this substitute should be adopted the views of the Senator from Nevada as well as the views of the Senator from Alabama would be in a position to be availed of and inquiries made in pursuance thereof.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would rather have the provision offered by the Senator from Georgia than to have no legislation whatever on this subject; but I emphatically say that my main purpose is not to create now such a tariff board as we would like, because that is impossible considering the balance of the parties. We have not the control of this body that we probably will have after the 4th of March next. It would be impossible probably to adopt to-day the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia.

Then the question arises whether we shall absolutely wipe out this organization or keep it alive until the new President comes in and the new Senate, when, charged with responsibility by the people, we can reorganize this board according to our party views. That is all I have to say at present upon this subject. It was only my intention to speak for a few minutes, but there have been so many interruptions that I have advanced step by step and have taken much time. I regard this as a provision of importance, and I hope it can be amended in such a way as to disarm Democratic opposition. I hope the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas will be accepted. I would ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he will accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BACON. That can not now be done.

Mr. BRISTOW. "Such officers shall report annually to Congress."

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to accept it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. So far as I am concerned, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I want to suggest that it can not now be done. An amendment having been offered, the original amendment can not now be altered by the action of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Can not the amendment be perfected?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the text of the original amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add, at the end of the committee amendment, the following:

Such officers shall report annually to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. STONE. Is that subject to amendment?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. STONE. In what degree is that amendment?

Mr. BACON. I want to submit this suggestion, if the Chair will permit me, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri, that where there are two propositions, each of them a substantive proposition like an original proposition or a substitute, each is open to amendment, and then the parliamentary body chooses between the two after each has been perfected. The original has been perfected by the action of the Senate in adopting the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, and it is now competent to perfect the substitute offered by me. Then the matter will be before the Senate for decision and determination as to which it will adopt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would so hold.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate to debate this question. I think any debate would in large measure be useless, so far as accomplishing results is concerned, and moreover it has been debated very fully from time to time in the past, and I think Senators here are quite well advised and that they have pretty well made up their opinion with respect to a tariff board or a tariff commission.

Personally I am opposed to a tariff commission or a tariff board. Two years ago the proposition was pending here to establish a permanent tariff commission. I stood on the floor of the Senate, in conjunction with two or three or four other Senators holding to views like mine, and opposed with all the energy I could the enactment of that law, and I think that opposition, protracted here in the Senate for hours and hours, running even into days——

Mr. OVERMAN. And nights.

Mr. STONE. Resulted in the final defeat of that measure. The President appointed an executive Tariff Board.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator will recall the fact that the bill originated in the House, and was supported in the House by Speaker CLARK and Mr. UNDERWOOD. It came to the Senate and passed the Senate. It went back to the House, and the filibuster was organized by men who were not on the Ways and Means Committee, but who were on the Appropriations Committee, and the result was that the bill failed because of want of time to act. I state that to show that eminent Democrats of the House favored that tariff bill at that time.

Mr. STONE. Some of the eminent Democrats of the House did. A majority of them did not favor it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not recall what the vote showed, but I do not think a large number voted for it.

Mr. STONE. I do not think when the eminent Democrats named by the Senator from Nevada voted for that proposition in the House they reflected the majority sentiment of the Democrats over there. However, I do not care to comment on that phase. Later I shall probably do so.

I say, instead of having a permanent tariff board or tariff commission this so-called tariff board, and executive body composed of men appointed by the President, has been undertaking in a large measure to discharge the duties that the proposed tariff commission was expected to undertake. I think the tariff board, so called, has enlarged by its own action or its own initiative, no doubt with the consent of the Executive, the scope of its statutory authority. But however that may be, I am opposed to boards of that kind.

We have had this board now for three years, I think. This is the fourth appropriation to be made for its support. It has already cost the Treasury $555,000. Here we are proposing to appropriate $225,000 more, making $775,000, or thereabouts, expended for the support of this executive board, and, as the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] very pertinently asks me, for what? For what good? For what end? They have made one or two reports to the President and through him to Congress. They made an examination into some questions relating to the reciprocity agreement contracted between the President and the Secretary of State representing this Government and the Government of Canada. Very little attention was paid to it. They made a report here on wool and, it may be, one or two other items, but when they make reports they are not followed.

Mr. President, I do not believe in allowing the President of the United States to choose the agency through which information is to be gathered for the use of Congress in passing tariff laws when Congress itself can get the information at first hand. I would rather have the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia than the one embodied in the bill. But I recall that a year or two ago, when this Tariff Commission proposition was up, hearing it discussed in the Finance Committee of the Senate. I think I am warranted in saying that the Democratic members of that committee were, so far as I recall, unanimous in the opinion that such a board ought not to be authorized, and they favored the policy of having a joint commission composed of Senators and Representatives, clothed with authority to make such inquiries as might be necessary and to employ such experts and clerical assistants as might be deemed advisable in prosecuting the inquiries, Congress having the whole thing in its own hands and doing the work through its own agencies, so that Congress might be advised, so that Congress might direct the course of the examination and stop it when they pleased and enlarge it at pleasure, and might direct the commission to ascertain what Congress wanted to find out, instead of turning loose a roving commission appointed by the President, composed of men who, so far as I know and am advised, are not endowed with any special fitness for the task imposed upon them.

You put a man on a board of this kind and say he is a tariff expert. What have these men done? What records have they made? What showing have they made that justifies a claim that they are specially qualified to carry on so important a work as this?

I prefer, if we are going to put anything in the bill at all, something such as I have hastily prepared here, even as against what the Senator from Georgia has suggested. I will read it, and I think I will submit it to the Senate:

To enable the Congress to secure information to assist it in the enactment of laws prescribing customs duties on imports and to assist the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, a commission, to be composed of five Senators, to be selected by the Finance Committee, and five Representatives, to be selected by the Ways and Means Committee, is hereby created and authorized to employ such expert and clerical assistants as said commission may deem necessary, and to enable said commission to do any and all things deemed necessary in connection therewith, $100,000.

That is enough.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that as to his suggestion for the appointment of the commission to be selected from the membership of those two committees, while I think myself it would be better that the full committees of the two Houses should be charged with the responsibility, I would not make any opposition to the change if it is deemed best. I quite agree with the Senator as to the amount of the appropriation. I will say to him very frankly that the amendment which I read was written very hurriedly, and the appropriation was simply taken from the bill, the main thought in my mind at the time being to transfer the matter from executive employees to the employees of the committees of Congress especially charged with the work.

Therefore I am perfectly willing that the matter shall be modified as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, if it is the general opinion that that is the better course. I am not wedded at all to what I proposed. As Senators will probably recall, when I offered my amendment I said that I did not flatter myself that it was perfect, but it furnished a basis upon which the Senate could act.

Mr. STONE. Nor had I flattered myself that this is perfect. It was drawn hastily. Would the Senator be willing to accept this as a modification of his amendment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BACON. No; I do not withdraw it. I consent to modify it to that extent. I simply agree that my amendment may be modified so that it will read as suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the Finance Committee of the Senate has the authority to-day that is embodied in the amendment offered by him, and the Ways and Means Committee of the House has equal authority in the House. I do not see any reason for action on the resolution. It takes five members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and five members of the Finance Committee of the Senate, and gives them the power that the whole committee of each House has to-day. The committees of the two Houses have the power to do just what the amendment proposes.

Mr. STONE. They get that power from resolutions.

Mr. SMOOT. They get the power from a resolution of the Senate and a resolution of the House.

Mr. STONE. The resolution passed by the Senate authorizes the Finance Committee to summon witnesses and make investigations. A like proceeding is authorized by the Ways and Means Committee under the House resolution. But here is a proposition to authorize a joint committee of the two Houses, with a distinct appropriation of $100,000, to employ experts and such assistants as this legislative commission may deem necessary to them in prosecuting inquiries. There would be a saving of $125,000 and possibly more. I really think $75,000 would be ample.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Mr. President, the Senator understands that the members of the Finance Committee, and also the members of the Ways and Means Committee, have numerous other duties, and I do not believe if this duty were imposed upon them they could work at it continuously. In fact, it would be impossible to do so. To-day, if there is any information in any part of the world that the Finance Committee desire, they have the power and authority to gather it in any legitimate way, and an appropriation to cover the expense, whether it be only $10,000 or whether it be $100,000. They are authorized to collect whatever information they desire, and that, I understand, is all that the amendment now proposed provides.

Mr. SIMMONS. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. STONE. If my friend will pardon me, I have really said all I care to say, and I will yield the floor to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I will interrupt the Senator from Utah. It was in reference to the Senator's statement that I wish to make some observations. I understood the Senator to insist that the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House have the power to do these things now. Possibly that may be true. That is to say, each of these committees may spend any reasonable sum of money out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House for the purpose of securing information to aid them when they are actually engaged in the preparation or consideration of tariff legislation.

I did not understand that the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Missouri was quite as limited and restricted as that. I understood that the purpose of their amendments was to create a commission with authority to acquire general information with respect to tariff matters.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understand it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, the Senator says that the members of these two committees who may be assigned as members of this commission would not have the time to give to the investigation of these questions, nor is it intended, as I understand it, that these commissioners should make these investigations. If I understand the purport of the amendment or the substitute it is to create a commission and place that commission, with respect to these tariff investigations, exactly in the position which the President occupies in the provision of law applicable to that subject now.

Mr. SMOOT. Then let me ask the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. The President is not expected to make these investigations. The President is simply authorized by the provision creating the board in the Payne-Aldrich Act and by the enlargement made by the provision in the sundry civil act to employ experts or any other persons whom he may see fit to secure this information and report to him. Now, the commission which it is proposed to raise is no more expected, as I take it, to make those investigations itself than the President under the present law is expected to make these investigations. The commission is raised for the purpose of doing this work through experts such as it may see fit to employ, and when these experts have gathered the information then that is submitted to the commission and the commission collates it; the commission reaches conclusions from it; the commission makes recommendations; but the commission itself is not expected to make these investigations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I realize, as does the Senator, that the President makes no investigations; but I can not see why we should take five members of the Finance Committee of the Senate and five members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and create a commission for them to do exactly what either of the full committees have the power to do to-day.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me, not necessarily five members of the Finance Committee or necessarily five members of the Ways and Means Committee, but five Members who will be suggested by these committees for appointment. They may come from the body of the Senate and the body of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose the original amendment of my colleague was passed providing that the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House, the two committees that represent the respective bodies in the study and preparation of these bills, should furnish us reports, and it was left to those committees to organize a commission and put it to work directly under the control of and reporting immediately to the two committees from the two Houses on whom the work of legislation primarily depends, would not that really be the most effective way to help to conduct this work?

Mr. SMOOT. My opinion is that it would not, for the reason that, if the Finance Committee of the Senate, with the Ways and Means Committee of the House, created a commission or a board, it is more than likely that the members of either of the committees would not go into the investigation and study of any report made to them by such a commission or board, as they would be responsible for the appointment of the personnel of the commission or board, whereas if the President appoints a board or a commission and they collect the information, every member of the committees of both Houses would study it with a great deal more care than if the report came from a commission created by the two committees. I think it very much better to allow the board to be created by the President than by a committee of the Senate and a committee of the House and have them report to the House and the Senate the findings of the board or commission appointed by them.

Mr. SHIVELY. Before the Senator takes his seat, permit me to ask whether he is to be understood as saying that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House is now fully equipped to secure all the information that could be secured by the body suggested and created by the amendments of the Senator from Georgia as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. And that the Committee on Finance of the Senate is fully equipped to secure like expert information?

Mr. SMOOT. Fully authorized.

Mr. SHIVELY. Fully authorized to secure it, and equipped, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will say equipped, although I do not believe it has the time to give it that is necessary.

Mr. SHIVELY. Has the Senator any doubt about the equipment of the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. I think so.

Mr. SHIVELY. It is fully equipped to secure all necessary information to do intelligent work on tariff questions.

Mr. SMOOT. I think so.

Mr. SHIVELY. Then what is the necessity to provide at all for this Tariff Board?

Mr. SMOOT. I have just explained one consideration. I think we could get better results by having the board appointed by the President.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does the Senator from Utah mean to say to the Senate that information coming from the President is a different thing from the information coming from his own committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; that is not the ground that I put it upon, Mr. President. I put it upon the ground that if a commission were appointed by two of the great committees of Congress to make a report to Congress, I do not believe that study will be given to the subject and the investigation made into it that would be made if a commission were appointed by the President to report information to be used by Congress.

Mr. SHIVELY. I should like for the Senator to give the Senate some reason for that conclusion.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Indiana has examined the report of the Tariff Board on the wool industry he will certainly concede that it is a very valuable and complete report, and that anyone who is interested in legislation affecting the wool tariff will get a great deal of very valuable information from it. If Congress has not availed itself of the information which has been furnished, the criticism is on Congress and not on the Tariff Board.

Any investigation made by a commission of this kind will be nonpartisan, while an investigation by a committee of Congress will be colored according to the politics of a majority of the committee. It seems to me that if we want unbiased information in regard to matters upon which we are to legislate the best way to get it is through a tariff commission. I think that the experience we have had with the Tariff Board demonstrates that to be a fact.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana begs to say to the Senator from Kansas that he has examined the series of volumes of information submitted by the Tariff Board on the wool question, and he finds that the conclusions of that Tariff Board in one important respect are just such conclusions as any Senator must have come to on the examination of the question himself, or on reflection without special examination.

The Senator from Kansas seems to think that the mere source of the appointment or the creation of a tariff board is to determine all questions to their bias on the tariff. Any man who may be appointed on a board will have some sort of politics. Be he a Republican, a Democrat, a Progressive, a Prohibitionist, a Socialist, or a Bull Moose man, he comes to his task with his own peculiar views on the tariff. The issue is distinctly partisan. No act of Congress, no resolution we can adopt, can refine away the predilections and biases which the appointee may have. It is straining a point to say that because a board is created by Congress its information can not be regarded as reliable, while the information of a board composed by the Executive is for that reason reliable. The Senator speaks of the report on wool and woolens. I note that among the conclusions found by the board is that out of 167 different labor costs it was found that in the establishments paying the highest wages the labor cost was lowest, and in the establishments paying the lowest wages the labor cost was highest.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that proves nothing——

Mr. SHIVELY. These were conclusions arrived at by the board. They do prove a great deal; there is no question about it, and yet the observation of every man who has given any real study to the question and noted the plain facts in it leads him to the same conclusion. Of course, the report is useful to the man who has no information and has sought none from other sources; and yet I believe the Senator from Kansas was sent here because it was thought he was well equipped to look into this question and determine for himself the facts about it. There are nearly 400 Representatives in the other House, each of whom was willing that his constituents should believe him to have special equipment on the tariff and to be able to arrive at intelligent conclusions. As has been suggested there is nothing in the appointments which have been made to the Tariff Board indicating that the appointees have peculiar capacity and special ability for the functions assigned to them by the act creating the board.

But I am not criticizing the personnel of the board. They were selected by the President for reasons sufficient to the President and in pursuance of a certain theory of how a tariff should be made. My criticism goes to the unsoundness of the theory and the essentially doubtful character of the information assembled by the board to be used in carrying it out. The fact is that so long as our tariffs are organized with primary reference to private enterprise rather than to Federal revenue the beneficiaries of the dutiable schedules are the natural sources of information as to what duties are necessary to render their enterprises profitable. Each knows the secrets of his own business. In the past, in hundreds of instances, men in protected lines of business have themselves written their own tariffs. This has been the rule rather than the exception. Now, you appoint a tariff board and proceed on the theory that in a brief time this appointed body will know as much about everybody's business affected by the dutiable schedules as each beneficiary or victim of the schedules knows about his own business. The result is that the portion of information reported that can be relied on is fully available from other governmental sources, and the rest is derived from sources uncertain, doubtful, and unreliable.

You proceed on the theory that you can ascertain the difference of cost at home and abroad and fix this difference as the scientific basis of tariff rates, as if to abolish the only incentive to or advantage of trade anywhere. So far as our country is concerned, the investigations by the Tariff Board only show what every thoughtful man already knew—that there are about as many different farm-product costs as there are farms, as many different factory-product costs as there are factories, and as many different mine-product costs as there are mines. In many industries the costs vary from year to year, and in not a few from month to month.

Of course, we must have information. But you go on the theory that the creation of a tariff board by Congress, the selection and appointment of its members by the President, their confirmation by the Senate, and the issue to them of commissions endow the members of the board with omniscience to report reliable information where the very nature of the subject precludes scientific accuracy.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana is entirely mistaken if he thinks that I believe that any board is as highly equipped as he indicates so as to be omniscient; but I must say—and I think the Senator will agree with me—that what we want in studying any question is information.

The Senator refers to the conclusions which the Tariff Board has drawn. Those conclusions may be justified and they may not be justified; those conclusions may be the same as would be the conclusions of the Senator from Indiana, or they may be different. We are not supposed to be controlled by the conclusions or opinions of the members of the Tariff Board, but we are supposed to welcome any information which intelligent men, organized and equipped for the purpose of securing that information, can furnish us.

The Senator indicates that we are sent here to legislate; I entirely agree with him as to that, but certainly the Senator does not expect every Senator or every Member of the other House to procure detailed information in regard to every bill that is presented and to try to ascertain all the detailed facts. We must, in a great many instances, depend upon the information that is compiled by officials of the United States Government.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. While I believe the report of the Tariff Board refers to those statements as conclusions, it is technically incorrect to call them conclusions. They are really statements of fact. As to the difference of cost, in 167 different institutions, which were subjected to the examination, they report that those institutions in which the highest wages were paid show the lowest labor cost of the product, and that those institutions in which the lowest wages were paid show the highest labor cost of the product.

Mr. BRISTOW. I agree with the Senator that the report of the board shows a wide diversity of conditions in various manufacturing enterprises in various countries, but certainly the Senator can not claim that the knowledge of this diversity of conditions everywhere is not valuable to a Senator or Member of the other House who is called upon to legislate upon a matter that is controlled or influenced to a certain degree by those conditions. It seems to me, when we say we do not want a board to be created for the purpose of securing information that will be of value to us in determining public questions, that we are taking a very strange position for men who are called upon and whose duties require them to legislate in behalf of a great Nation.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, one of the difficulties confronting the Senate on a question like the one now before it is that the moment an appropriation is suggested for the purpose of securing information we are expected to promptly vote any amount called for without reference to the present existence of ample facilities to secure the same information provided and maintained at heavy expense to the Government. No Senator wishes to close any avenue to needful and useful information. The Senator ignores the fact of our present means of information outside of the Tariff Board. There is the Department of Commerce and Labor. It is equipped with a series of bureaus. We are appropriating over $20,000,000 a year for this department. It has its large supply of special agents. Then there is our Consular Service, with its officials in every city and town of any considerable size in every foreign country. If the kind of information to which the Senator has referred is necessary to intelligent tariff legislation, the machinery to procure it is at hand in so far as such information is procurable by any agency whatever.

But to return to the point I was discussing when interrupted by the Senator, when every resource shall have been exhausted to assemble the infinite variety of costs in our own country, the problem of the difference between cost at home and abroad is still unsolved. The same variety of costs exists in each line of industry abroad as in our own country. Our Government confessedly possesses no inquisitorial power whatever to compel a foreign farm, factory, or mine owner to exhibit his cost sheets or admit us in any other way to the secret of the cost of his product. Will he be likely to rush forward to furnish information on which to have a tariff framed against him? If anyone can procure this information, the consul can do it. If the information is refused, no tariff board can secure it. If it be secured at all, it will disclose the same wide variety and fluctuations of costs that characterize industry in our own country and make so-called differences of costs a farcical basis of tariff legislation.

The difference between the cost of product as between home and abroad is impossible of accurate official ascertainment. The final conclusive and only accurate test of ability to compete is shown in the market, not on the farm or in the factory or mine. No, it is not a question of providing suitable information. It is a question of appropriating $225,000 to secure information which in so far as it is available at all is already at the command of the Government, if the existing agencies of the Government are exerted to this end.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that the Tariff Board's report on Schedule K presents the most elaborate investigation of that subject that has ever been submitted to the American Congress?

Mr. SHIVELY. Why, certainly, it is elaborate. The board could have multiplied its volumes by five and it would have appeared still larger and have been more elaborate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, I do not know as to that; I doubt whether five more volumes would have been any more valuable than the five we have; but certainly it seems to me that we have more reliable and more extensive information than we ever had before, and, I think, are better prepared to legislate on that question than any Congress that has preceded us. I should like for the Tariff Board to be continued, so that we could have information equally as accurate and extensive in regard to every schedule of the tariff bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. If the Senator please, they found 167 different labor costs in a single industry.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, that is a condition that we have no control over. They report the facts. Is it not important that we should know what the facts are?

Mr. SHIVELY. True, they report the facts as they found them. You say you want these facts as the basis of tariff legislation?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is necessary information to have, in order to legislate intelligently.

Mr. SHIVELY. How would you legislate on tariff rates, with reference to 167 different labor costs in a single industry?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIVELY. I think the Senator from Indiana had the floor to start with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will correct himself. The Senator from Indiana did have the floor. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIVELY. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was merely going to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. He makes the statement that the Tariff Board reported as to 167 different labor costs. That upon its face ought to be qualified, for the board makes the statement that, taking 167 institutions into consideration, the results showed that high-priced labor makes the lowest-priced goods; but the reason of that was that the 167 institutions have the best-equipped mills in the world. Of course a mill that is equipped with all the modern machinery, running at the highest possible speed, with every improvement that can possibly be made in the manufacture of woolen goods can produce goods cheaper than a mill that is not so equipped.

Mr. SHIVELY. That raises many questions going to the very merits of the whole tariff controversy.

Mr. SMOOT. It certainly does, and it is the very purpose——

Mr. SHIVELY. Do you arrange your tariffs with reference to sloth, indifference, and inefficiency or with some reference to energy, enterprise, and efficiency?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, no one even intimated such a thing, but in the making of tariffs we ought to have the information. We ought to have the information of what it costs in the best mills in the world to make goods; then the Senator from Indiana and every other Senator may use his own discretion as to what the rate should be.

Mr. SHIVELY. That, of course, is assuming again that information, so far as procurable at all, is not available without this appropriation, all of which I deny.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHIVELY. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the Senator make the hour a little later.

Mr. BORAH. I am not asking for an adjournment; I am asking that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I know——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that, but I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator. The Finance Committee is to hold a meeting to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we have a meeting at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that he make the hour 11 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are to have at that time a very important meeting, I understand. The chairman of the Finance Committee has been absent for some little time, and we have been waiting upon him to return in order to have a meeting. He has returned, and I understand has called a meeting of the committee for 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I will withdraw my motion with the understanding that I am going to insist from this time on that we meet at 10 o'clock, and if that is not done it will be because the Senate votes against meeting at 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has submitted a substitute for the committee amendment. The Senator from Missouri proposes to modify that substitute. The substitute as proposed to be modified will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

To enable the Congress to secure needed information to assist it in the enactment of laws prescribing customs duties to be levied on imports and to assist the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws a commission, to be composed of five Senators to be selected by the Finance Committee of the Senate and five Representatives to be selected by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, is hereby created and is hereby authorized to employ such expert and clerical assistance as said commission may deem necessary, and to enable said commission to do any and all things deemed necessary in connection therewith, $100,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand that is offered in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain two substitutes at one time.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply said I would agree to the modification of the substitute I offered, so that it will read as it has just been stated at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia accepts the modification.

Mr. WARREN. I understand, then, the Senator from Georgia accepts the amendment which has been read in place of the one offered by him.

Mr. BACON. I do so, I desire to say, because I am willing to yield my judgment to that of others. I would prefer the original, but I will, for the purpose of meeting the views of others, accept that modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute which has just been read.

Mr. WARREN. I hope it may not carry.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I transfer it to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is absent. Were I permitted to vote, I should vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent. During his absence I have a sort of understanding with him that I will not vote. I regard that as a pair. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. He has a pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to inquire whether the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will withhold my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. LODGE. My colleague [Mr. CRANE] is unavoidably absent from the city. He stands paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON].

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. STONE. I wish to offer an amendment, at the end of line 4, on page 3, to strike out "$225,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to read $100,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to make the same announcement that I did on the former roll call. My colleague [Mr. CRANE] stands paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to inquire whether the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has voted, having transferred his pair.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BRADLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I transferred my pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. As he has come in and voted, I now withdraw my vote, but announce that if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under the rule I feel at liberty to vote. I have no regular pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's name will be called.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan, and he voted "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 20, as follows:

So the committee amendment as amended was agreed to

Mr. WARREN. There is a committee amendment, on page 2, line 13, to strike out the two words "rates of" and insert the article "a."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 13, before the word "compensation," strike out the words "rates of" and insert "a."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. The next amendment that we passed over is on page 105.

The SECRETARY. On page 105, lines 7 to 12, as amended, the paragraph reads:

Purchase of motor boat, Alaska: To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to purchase a motor boat for use in the District of Alaska in the investigation of unlawful cutting of timber from the public lands, the inspection of timber cut under permit, and the examination of alleged illegal entries, $5,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a roll call.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The ayes have it, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. The next amendment is, on page 125, under the heading "Miscellaneous objects, Department of Justice." I wish to say particularly to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that I am not certain whether he has had a conference with my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. WARREN. Whether he wishes both amendments made, and to let them both go to the conferees, or to offer his own amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My suggestion would be that where the time limit is placed at two years for the employment of anyone retiring from the department, it might well be reduced to six months. Then, with that amendment inserted reducing the time limit to six months, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, the amendment which I suggest to follow immediately after, I think it would relieve——

Mr. WARREN. I much prefer that the Senator's amendment, as he has shown it to me this morning, would go in about line 6.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have tried to fix it at that part of the paragraph, but you will find that it cuts off the language following, and read, then, as a whole, it renders the language confusing. If placed at the conclusion of all the language, it is perfectly clear and does not prevent that which precedes from being clear.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand the Senator, then, he proposes to leave the part stricken out and to insert the other matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I would leave the entire language as it came from the House, changed only by striking out the term "two years" and inserting "six months" as the length of time for employment in the department that outside employment may be had, followed with the amendment of the Senator from Texas, which I suggest be read by the Secretary. It follows immediately after the amendment which I offered.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest, if agreeable, that the Secretary read the whole paragraph as it would read if amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; as it would read if amended, reading "six months" instead of "two years." I think these amendments relieve the provision as it came from the House of its objectionable features and preserve what is good in it, and also guard against the danger suggested by the Attorney General.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not object to having the paragraph read as it would read if amended, so that Senators may understand it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paragraph will be read as it would read if the amendments submitted by the Senator from Georgia should be agreed to.

The Secretary read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS OBJECTS, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

That no part of any appropriation made under this act for the following purposes, namely, conduct of customs cases; defending suits and claims against the United States, detection and prosecution of crime; defense in Indian depredation claims; enforcement of antitrust laws; suits to set aside conveyances of allotted land, Five Civilized Tribes; enforcement of acts to regulate commerce; for payment of assistants to the Attorney General and to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney General to aid in special cases; and for payment of such miscellaneous expenditures as may be authorized by the Attorney General for the United States courts and their officers; shall be used for the payment of any salary, fee, compensation, or allowance in any form whatever to any person who holds any other office, place, position, or appointment under the United States Government, or any department thereof, or to anyone hereafter appointed, designated, or employed, who within six months next preceding the date of his appointment, designation, or employment has held any other office, place, position, or appointment under the United States

Government, or any department thereof: Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply except in cases where the persons appointed, designated, employed, or paid shall have previously rendered service in connection with the same subject matter: And provided further, That nothing in the foregoing provision shall prevent a person who holds an office, place, position, or appointment under the United States Government, or any department thereof, from being detailed to other work falling under the appropriations for the purpose hereinbefore named and from being paid out of said appropriations, the amount of the payments not to exceed the amount of compensation which said person would have received from his regular office, place, position, or appointment, together with his expenses incident to his temporary detail.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Massey	Smith, Ga.
Bacon	Fletcher	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Bradley	Gronna	Oliver	Smoot
Brandegee	Heyburn	Overman	Stephenson
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Page	Sutherland
Burnham	Jones	Penrose	Swanson
Burton	Kenyon	Percy	Thornton
Catron	Lippitt	Perkins	Townsend
Chamberlain	Lodge	Poindexter	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Pomerene	Wetmore
Crawford	McLean	Sanders
Cullom	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. If there be no objection, the Chair will treat the two amendments submitted by the Senator from Georgia as one. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee striking out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. An amendment was offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], which I wish to transfer from page 181, where it appears, to page 196, to come in just before the closing section, and give it a proper number and amend it with the marginal note on the RECORD which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert the amendment that was inserted on page 181 at page 196, at the end of the bill:

Nothing contained in an act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, approved June 26, 1912, shall be construed so as to prohibit the payment from the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture of expenses incidental to the delivery of lectures and the giving of instruction by its employees on subjects relating to agriculture or live-stock growing to any meeting or convention of farmers or live-stock growers or any convention of members of any society or association thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. The committee has one more amendment, which I will ask be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert on page 114, after line 23:

BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

The Bureau of Education of the Department of the Interior is hereby exempted from the provisions of section 8 of the act of Congress approved June 26, 1912, entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," and the payment of expenses of officers and employees of the bureau in attending meetings or conventions of educational societies or associations, or in visiting educational institutions for the purpose of collecting and disseminating information relating to educational conditions, is hereby authorized to be made from the appropriations made for the Bureau of Education for collecting statistics and for the investigation of rural education, industrial education, and school hygiene.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Is that a new amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming offers the amendment in behalf of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, no man can tell anything about an amendment of that kind by merely having it read in this way. I have not the slightest disposition to obstruct the passage of the bill, but I most earnestly protest against the effort that is now being made to force through these important amendments without time to consider them.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me a moment? If he has the slightest objection to the amendment, and I am allowed to do so, I will withdraw it.

Mr. REED. I am not filing an objection to the amendment in particular, for I do not know what it is. I have heard it read from the desk in the confusion of the Senate and in such a way that as to grasping its meaning I am not sure that I have done so. But what I am protesting against and intend to protest against is the effort now being made to force this bill through after the usual hour of adjournment with these important amendments to it and without the opportunity to clearly understand what is proposed. I do not want to delay the passage of the bill a moment beyond what is necessary to a proper consideration.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I would be glad to explain it in a dozen words, or I will withdraw it. I have no——

Mr. REED. Well——

Mr. PAGE. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. REED. When I have completed the sentence I have several times undertaken to utter I will gladly yield to the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. REED. We all understand now the purpose is to push this bill through to-night, the idea evidently being that because of the hardship of waiting here, when no notice has been given of any night session, matters will be passed through which otherwise might meet with opposition. I protest against that kind of a proceeding when we are dealing with the money of the people to the amount of millions of dollars. I insist that this bill ought to go over until to-morrow morning and that we may then take up these important amendments and consider them properly. I gladly yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think this is the last amendment to be offered by the committee. I understand there are several other amendments to be offered by Senators.

Mr. WARREN. The committee has offered its last amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri yields to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I only want to say that so far as I can do so I shall object to the withdrawal of this amendment; and I am sure the Senator from Missouri, if he understood it, would not object to its passage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not know what it is. That is just the trouble. And nobody else in this part of the Chamber, unless he has better hearing than I have, could tell what it is from the reading at the desk.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I do not want to have any good amendment withdrawn or any good amendment beaten, and I do not want any bad amendment put through here when we are not in any frame of mind to consider it. That is why I say the bill ought to go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to explain this? It will take but a moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have the amendment again stated.

Mr. WARREN. I can state what it is more quickly than it can be read at the desk. There was incorporated in the District of Columbia appropriation bill a paragraph forbidding the attendance of any employee or officer of any department in Washington, at the expense of the Government, at any of the national gatherings, as had been done heretofore, unless specially provided for in each department by appropriation or otherwise. That sweeping paragraph affected certain interests, such, for instance, as some of the services in the Department of Agriculture. It would place them in such a position that they could not do the demonstration work and could not visit various sections of the country for the purpose of demonstrating to farmers methods of eradicating the boll weevil, and so forth. It would also prevent the Marine Hospital surgeons from attending meetings for which the law provides. In this case it is proposed to repeal the provision as to the officers of the Bureau of Education and give them authority simply to attend certain annual society meetings or conventions that are provided for and required by law, under the direction of the head of the bureau.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest now that we have order in the Senate so that we may hear the amendment read, and that it may again be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator like to have me read the provision in the District of Columbia appropriation act from which it is proposed to exempt the Bureau of Education?

Mr. REED. I think I understand that; but is there any limit in this amendment on the amount that can be expended in this way?

Mr. WARREN. That would be in the appropriation that provides for the bureau. This proposal does not appropriate anything, but exempts the Bureau of Education from the prohibition of the law against expending money for such gathering.

Mr. REED. It exempts them from it without placing any limitation. All I can say about it is I doubt the wisdom of exempting one department when you place the limitation upon the other. I am not going to oppose the amendment, for I do not understand about it, but I insist that Senators on the other side ought not to try to railroad this bill through to-night.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I understand that there are several Senators present who, no notice having been given that it was the intention to keep them here to-night, have made engagements for the evening which they can not very well break. I think when it is the purpose to remain longer than the usual hour there ought to be some notice of that fact given in advance. I do not say this in my own interest at all, for I have nothing which will keep me from remaining here until 12 o'clock to-night, if the Senator from Wyoming so desires.

Mr. WARREN. The bill is finished, so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking in my own interest now, but I repeat I have that information as to some other Senators. I understand, also, there are other amendments—I have none myself—to be offered by individual Senators, not committee amendments. As Senators do not make that suggestion for themselves, I make it for them without their request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I gave notice of my intention the other day to offer an amendment to the bill, and I now send it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 101, after line 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

PENSION BUREAU.

Three hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to employ, temporarily, extra clerks by the Commissioner of Pensions to aid him in the work incident to the adjudication of pension claims filed under the act entitled "An act granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912, at salaries not to exceed $1,200 each; and in order to facilitate said work the Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to employ clerks heretofore employed in other departments of the Government service, or others who may be sufficiently skilled to do the required work, without complying with the requirements of the civil-service laws: Provided, however, That none of said extra clerks shall continue in the service beyond the fiscal year of this appropriation without further legislation, or by reason of said employment alone be eligible for transfer to the service in other departments, or be continued longer than may be necessary to do the work hereby provided for.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, it is a very ungracious thing to refuse any necessary help in the Pension Bureau; but I wish to say to the Senator that the matter is now, as I am informed, being considered by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of another body in connection with an appropriation bill which follows this one. The committee of the Senate is without any estimate, and I wish the Senator would withhold the amendment from this bill and let us have it considered when we know what the other House does with the bill which is to follow.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have some indirect information to the effect that the committee now considering that bill has declined to take the matter up; and it was after I had that information that I prepared this amendment. There will be about 450,000 claims filed under the act of May 11, 1912. The Commissioner of Pensions appeared before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations and testified that at that time they could only handle about 400 cases per day; they can handle now about 600. At that rate, it would take 750 days to adjudicate these claims. The commissioner testified—I will not take the time to read all he said——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I do not propose to object to the amendment. I merely wanted to advise the Senator that I thought it would be better to have it come in in connection with the other bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I understood the Senator was objecting. If he is not, I will not take the time of the Senate further.

Mr. WARREN. I am not objecting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in on page 159, line 23.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 159, after line 23, it is proposed to insert the following:

To enable the Commissioner of Fisheries to investigate the method of fishing known as beam or otter trawling and to report to Congress whether or not this method of fishing is destructive to the fish species or is otherwise harmful or undesirable, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. If that motion is to be made, I hope the Senator will at least allow us to have an executive session.

Mr. WARREN. I should like the Senator from Missouri to withhold the motion, also, in order that I may ask unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri withhold the motion?

Mr. REED. I may do so, when I hear the request.

Mr. WARREN. Since the Senator from Missouri desires that the Senate adjourn, I wish to ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be taken up to-morrow morning immediately after the morning business and that we proceed with it until it is concluded.

Mr. REED. I withhold my motion for that purpose. I am content with the suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, would the Senator from Missouri be willing to substitute for his motion to adjourn a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the request preferred by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the sundry civil bill be taken up immediately after the morning business to-morrow and proceeded with until finished.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator that he does not design by that to displace the regular order?

Mr. WARREN. I do not desire to displace the regular order, because I assume that that will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BACON. The understanding would be that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] would ask that it be temporarily laid aside when the morning hour expired.

Mr. WARREN. I was assuming that we ought not to reach that hour, for the consideration of the bill is nearly concluded; but I feel assured that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] will arrange about the regular order so that we may have no difficulty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I withdraw my motion at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 24, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 23, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art supremely great, the King of Kings and Lord of Lords, above all, through all, and in us all, to whom the rich, the poor, the high, the lowly, the good, the bad, may look up in faith and confidence and call thee "Father," help us to rid ourselves of selfishness, which is the root of all evil, that we may become fit temples for the indwelling of Thy spirit, that righteousness may reign supreme in all the earth, to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

The Clerk began the reading of the Journal.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will suspend.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to suggest that before we proceed with this bill we should have a quorum.

The SPEAKER. We are not proceeding with the bill. We are having the Journal read.

Mr. McMORRAN. Then I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is none of the Chair's business, but would not the gentleman reserve that point until we get through with the Journal, and then raise the point? The gentleman raises the point that there is no quorum present.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, evidently there is not a quorum present. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Members will answer "present."

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the Journal.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SAUNDERS requests leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

Mr. MORRISON requests leave of absence for 5 days, on account of important business.

Mr. LINDSAY requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

Mr. PORTER requests leave of absence for 1 week, on account of illness in his family.

Mr. LINTHICUM requests leave of absence for 1 day, on account of important public business.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, these requests will be granted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest to gentlemen of the House that I know of no more important business than fulfilling the functions here for which they were elected, although I shall not object at this time to these requests.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will state it.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I have been recorded, Mr. Speaker, for some time past as being paired with different Members in this House. I have never given my permission to be paired with any man in this House. I have never wanted to be paired.

It is noted here on May 12, 1911, that I was paired with Mr. Gordon, of Tennessee, who is now dead. That is not so. I never was paired. On May 18, 1911, I am recorded as having being paired with Mr. AIKEN of South Carolina. I never gave permission to be paired with him, or he with me. And so on, through the different items where I have been paired, I want to say it is absolutely false, and I have been misrepresented. I have never asked yet to be paired with any man on the floor of this House, and I ask that the RECORD be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman evidently had a right to rise to a question of personal privilege about it, although the Chair has absolutely no control whatever over the matter of pairing. That is a private arrangement. Of course the practice has been that the Chair undertakes to enforce the contracts entered into, but whether one can have the RECORD corrected as far back as May 12, 1911, is a matter that the Chair would not like to pass upon.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the permanent RECORD has been made up of that date, but of course the remarks of the gentleman will go into the RECORD as of to-day, and the correction will appear as he makes it.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD clerk informs the Chair that the permanent RECORD has been made up, and it would be a physical impossibility to change the permanent RECORD of May 12, 1911, or of any date approximating thereto.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDWARDS. In the event the change in the RECORD is made, in accordance with the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN], would the RECORD then show the gentleman as having been absent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. It can not be done. It is a physical impossibility.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I will.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he was present at those times?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I can not go back now and find out whether I was present or not present. But that does not make any difference. There is not a Member in this House who has been more attentive to his duties and has been here more days than I have been.

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not question the gentleman's attendance or diligence.

The SPEAKER. This whole discussion is out of order. The Chair will state, in justice to the pair clerks, that of course they do not undertake to pair people who do not want to be paired. They must have fallen into some honest error about the matter. The pair clerks have absolutely no right to pair a man unless he wishes to be paired, and it would be a very healthy mental exercise if all the Members of the House would dig up Senator Benton's book and read his opinion about this pairing business anyway. That is the end of that.

METROPOLITAN COACH CO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 2904) to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to regulate the operation and equipment of the vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co., with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate and a conference asked.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendments and that the request of the Senate for a conference be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. ROTHERMEL, Mr. LOBECK, and Mr. KAHN.

LAWS RELATIVE TO SEAMEN.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I call up for further consideration the bill (H. R. 23673) to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen.

The SPEAKER. For the information of the House the Clerk will, if there be no objection, report the amendment that was pending yesterday when the House adjourned, being an amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "States," insert the following: "Except those running on lakes, bays, sounds, and rivers."

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the reasons and motives that prompted the introduction of this amendment, for there must have been a reason for it. The gentleman has stated, "so far as the Great Lakes are concerned, there has been no complaint at all, and if I understand the provisions rightly, it increases very greatly the number of firemen, inasmuch as, so far as the committee knows, both the firemen and owners of the lake vessels are satisfied with the conditions upon the Great Lakes."

He assumes here that both the firemen and owners of the vessels are satisfied with the present state of things on the Great Lakes. In reply to this I beg leave to state to the gentleman that I differ with him, and, differing with him, I desire to call the attention of the members to the real situation there.

So far as the owners of these boats are concerned, they are perfectly satisfied with the present conditions as they now exist upon the Great Lakes. But the public and the firemen and those engaged in the laborious task of navigating the Great Lakes are not satisfied, and the reason they are not satisfied is clearly evident when we consider the situation as it actually exists. Before considering these matters, and in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], I took occasion last evening to telegraph to the secretary of the Lake Seamen's Union, at Chicago, Ill., with reference to the general effect of this amendment upon the existing state of affairs upon the Lakes, and the effect that the passage of this amendment would have, not only with reference to the firemen, but also to the general conditions affected by it.

JULY 22, 1912.

V. A. OLANDER,
Secretary Lake Seamen's Union,
570 West Lake Street, Chicago, Ill.:

On line 10, page 2, of the bill it is to be contended to-morrow that it is not necessary that sailors be divided into two and firemen into three watches on the Great Lakes; that many vessels are only in day service. Wire what you think about it.

THOMAS GALLAGHER,
Member of Congress.

In reply to this I received this morning a telegram setting forth that it is not prudent to pass this amendment; and he further gives the reasons why the same should not be passed, in that there are but few boats that navigate for the period of one day or more, and that, for the security of life and property, it is absolutely essential that the number of watches provided for in this bill shall be kept and maintained at all hours, owing to the hazardous conditions of navigation upon the Great Lakes, which is greater than upon the ocean. He also points out how they place the sailor in occupations not connected with navigation—to do the work of the common laborer in nowise connected with navigation. He further shows the incompetency of the men now navigating the Great Lakes and the necessity for an immediate improvement along these lines.

I now read to you gentlemen the telegram, which is as follows and speaks for itself:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 22, 1912.

Hon. THOMAS GALLAGHER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The division of watches, as provided by bill, is essentially necessary. There is no such thing as exclusive day service on Lakes. Where that term is used it applies only to a few of the passenger ships, and means all day and half or more of the night. All vessels, except harbor craft, which do not leave port, now carry two watches of sailors, because it is a physical impossibility to operate them otherwise. The only exception to this is four or five vessels sailing out of Detroit, one or two out of Toledo and Cleveland, and possibly two out of Buffalo, and these are passenger boats notoriously undermanned and dangerous. The real reason some shipowners object to provisions of bill regarding watches is not on account of so-called day service. A number of passenger vessels make a practice of working most of the deck crew at cargo all the time in port and letting them sleep between ports; result is that only two or at most three sailors, including man at wheel, are on watch while at sea. Many freight vessels work part of their deck crew all day while at sea, letting them sleep at night; result is that entire deck crew of immense 600-foot steamer on watch at night is one sailor at wheel and one supposedly on lookout, but who must look after everything on deck and many things below decks. This is a general practice and extremely dangerous, since the effect is that ship is dangerously undermanned. This can only be remedied by dividing sailors into two watches. All steamers on the Great Lakes, except exclusive harbor craft, have now at least two watches of firemen; many of them have already established the three-watch system for such men. Firing a steamship is mighty hard and hot work, and physical effect on men extremely bad unless they are given sufficient rest between watches.

V. A. OLANDER,
Secretary Lake Seamen's Union.

That is from V. A. Olander, secretary of the Lake Seamen's Union?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does not the gentleman know that Victor Olander does not represent any of the men on the Great Lakes?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is that so?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly that is so. I ask the gentleman if that is not true?

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is hardly true. And I will tell you why he does not represent a great many of them now. It is because there has been a strike on the Great Lakes for the past four years, and there is a war on between the vessel owners and the seamen, and the able seamen have been driven from the Lakes.

The present conditions on the Lakes are such as to make life and property insecure, for as I have already stated, navigation there is more dangerous than that on the sea or the ocean. Accidents occur there very frequently, due to these conditions, which should be safeguarded, whereas when we sought to obtain from Congress proper protection to human life in the way of safeguards on the railroads and the use thereon of safety appliances and other methods of protection, there was great opposition.

Conditions on the Lakes, so far as labor in concerned, are unbearable. Life on the Great Lakes is not held very sacred, when we take into consideration the fact that navigating the Great Lakes is more dangerous than navigating the sea. It is more hazardous, and storms occur more frequently.

As things exist on the Lakes to-day they are similar to what they were on the railroads years ago before Congress began legislating and compelling the railroads to adopt safety appliances for the protection of life. There is little or no record kept of the great number of lives that are sacrificed upon the Great Lakes. There is no systematic reporting of accidents as they occur. And while the Government has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in building life-saving stations, erecting storm signals, the placing of buoys, and other devices for the protection of life, the owners of boats have given little care for the security of life upon the Great Lakes, or the lives of their employees, and, as I told the gentleman, nearly all of the capable seamen have been driven from the Lakes on account of the war between the vessel owners and the seamen, and in their places have been gathered a lot of incompetent and untrained seamen to fill positions calling for the most skilled and expert men.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if that war was not brought on by the unbearable conditions forced on the men, the able seamen, who were working on the Lakes?

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is exactly the fact; and let us see who owns these vessels.

Many of these great vessels on the Great Lakes are owned by the Steel Trust and the great railroads, the Pennsylvania, the Erie, the Lackawanna, the great wheat shippers, and these together with the coal-mining interests monopolize the shipping and have driven the private owners of vessels from the Lakes. These are the owners of the Lake vessels, and they have control of nearly all of the Lake traffic.

There is a bill now pending in the Senate for the protection of life at sea, the introduction of which was brought about by the recent great disaster to the Titanic, and an effort is being made to prevent hereafter a like disaster. The bill provides that upon all navigable bodies of water the vessels shall be supplied with wireless telegraph apparatus. Now, these same owners, the owners of these great boats, with few exceptions, come before Congress and petition Congress not to have the same requirements applied to the great freight boats navigating the Great Lakes, and we must remember that we have but few passenger boats in comparison with the freight carriers on the Lakes. The same objection to putting wireless apparatus on Lake boats was urged against putting two wireless operators on the great boats on the sea, and it was this which, in a measure, brought about the Titanic disaster. What is the use of legislating for seamen on the ocean and excepting the seamen on the Lakes? A comparison shows that the traffic on the Lakes and that entering many of the Lake ports is greater than that of any seaport in this country.

I have before me the report of the superintendent of canals at Sault Ste. Marie, which shows that—

Eighteen thousand six hundred and seventy-three ships of 41,653,488 net tons register passed through the canals during the season of 1911. Of this number 11,870 vessels of 22,321,519 net tons register passed through the United States canal, and 6,803 vessels of 19,331,969 net tons register passed through the Canadian canal. * * * The freight carried through the Canadian canal was 30,953,869 tons as against 22,523,347 tons for the American canal.

When we compare these figures with those of the Suez Canal traffic, we see how far greater they are and how much more voluminous the tonnage is here. The following is a table showing for the year 1909 the gross and net tonnage of vessels passing through the Suez Canal:

Gross	21,500,847
Net	15,407,527

This is less than one-half the net tonnage of our canals.

In Chicago we are going to work now to expend four or five million dollars in the improvement of our harbor; money that will be raised by the people of the city to make these improvements. We are doing it in an effort to increase Lake traffic and make it possible for the larger boats to land in Chicago. As a result of conditions on the Lakes, traffic has been driven from them, and I suppose it is the same reason that has been driving it from all of the great rivers. We are expending millions of dollars to improve and increase water-borne traffic; let us bring about by legislation that which will make life bearable on the Great Lakes, and let us oppose this amendment.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, a number of communications from different organizations in the city of Chicago, as follows:

EDWARD MCCORMICK,
5615 Carpenter Street.

I offer these to show that the organized workingmen of Chicago know exactly what the provisions of this bill are, so far as traffic on the Great Lakes is concerned, and they do not want this bill amended or mutilated in any way.

The laboring people of this country are making every effort to improve the conditions of labor everywhere. They are earnest in their efforts for the welfare of all who toil, whether before the mast or on the shore; whether in the hold of a ship or in the bowels of the earth. They are striving for the betterment of humanity, and I am anxious to give them an opportunity for the betterment of conditions upon the sea as this bill provides, and I hope it will pass in its original form and that this amendment will be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to reply briefly to some statements that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] has made in regard to the Great Lakes, and I hope the gentleman will give me his attention. I never made a statement to the effect that men who are not upon these vessels had not made complaint about their condition. The statement I made, and I think it is absolutely true, was that, so far as the committee knows, there is no complaint from the men themselves who are employed on the Great Lakes. Mr. Olander, as I understand it, does not represent the firemen upon the Great Lakes—that is, those who are actually working. He represents the union. As I understand, some two or three years ago there was some difficulty between the Lake Carriers' Association and the union, and since that time the men on the Great Lakes are not represented by Mr. Olander.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. As a matter of fact, prior to the strike Mr. Olander represented the great bulk of seamen and firemen on the Lakes. Since that time other men have been employed by the members of the Lake Carriers' Association, so that the members of the union are no longer employed by the members of the Lake Carriers' Association; but Mr. Olander represents yet a large number of men who are employed on independent vessels that are not a part of the Lake Carriers' Association.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If Mr. Olander represents any of the firemen on the Great Lakes, his statement is entitled to weight as such; but I do not understand that he does represent any of the firemen on the Great Lakes, and, so far as the two watches on the deck are concerned, we have no objection to that. That portion of the telegram which the gentleman read in regard to two watches on the deck nobody is objecting to. Most of the vessels, I think, have adopted two watches on deck already.

Mr. GALLAGHER. But the gentleman desires us to exclude the Lakes from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And the reason I do it is this: As I said, there has been no complaint before our committee that any of the firemen make objection to present conditions. As I further understand the fact to be, in a great many cases it would increase the number of firemen by one-third on the vessel, and the firemen themselves prefer conditions as they now are.

I want to read now the only communication, so far as I know, that the committee has received upon that subject. This is a letter received from Mr. Harvey D. Goulder, who is attorney for the Lake Carriers' Association, and I will read one paragraph from it. He says:

> We on the Great Lakes have endeavored to be fair with our employees. We have no complaint from them in regard to this matter. We are willing to submit to any investigation on the subject which involves the possible humiliation that, having endeavored to be fair and even generous, we are called before your honorable committee by those who in no sense or degree represent the men in our employ—> with whom we are honestly and conscientiously endeavoring to deal justly and honestly as man to man, recognizing the obligation and asking only due reciprocal obligation of fairness between employer and employee.

And he was there referring to Mr. Olander, I presume—

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I understood and read from the record the gentleman said that the committee had no complaints, that there were no complaints so far as the committee was concerned.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Before the committee, representing the men on the Great Lakes. If Mr. Olander represents any of them, I withdraw the remarks to that extent.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The gentleman said there was no dissatisfaction so far as the committee knows. My object in bringing this information is to give it to the House, which is passing upon this bill, and to show the Members of the House the conditions that actually exist.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, the point I am making is that the man who appeared before our committee and objected did not represent the men on the vessels——

Mr. GALLAGHER. I think I am pretty well advised in regard to the attorney for the Lake Carriers' Association——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington (continuing). In other words, as I understand it, on the Great Lakes trouble exists—I am not assuming anything whatever as to who is right or wrong——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman may have two minutes more, in order that he may answer a question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I amend that by making it five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky amends by making it five minutes. Is there objection to the extension to five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman reads a communication from Mr. Harvey J. Goulder. Has he not for years and years been the regular representative of the shipowners in opposition to almost every reform measure in regard to seamen before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why does the gentleman take up the time of the House to ask that question, because when I mentioned the name I said that he was the representative of the Lake Carriers' Association?

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman can answer the question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I refuse to yield further——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington (continuing). Because it carried the implication that I undertook to read something without stating who the gentleman was that made it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. What I wanted to ask the gentleman and what I think this House is interested in——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY. I asked permission that the time of the gentleman be extended for the purpose of asking him a question.

The SPEAKER. So soon as the time was extended the gentleman from Texas lost control of it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yielded to the gentleman. I will yield to the gentleman again if he wants to ask a question.

Mr. HARDY. I suggest to the gentleman whether he simply will answer the question whether for years Mr. Goulder has not been filling the position and taking the position of opposition to every reform measure for the good of the seamen?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the contrary Mr. Goulder has not occupied any such position. He is the representative of the Lake Carriers' Association, but he has not opposed all measures in favor of seamen, but, on the contrary, has often favored such legislation. Here is a letter addressed to the committee that shows exactly what his position is.

Mr. HARDY. Has there ever been any bill before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries that he has not opposed which was for the benefit of seamen?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: I think it is immaterial whether a complaint has been made or not——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. So do I.

Mr. SHERLEY (continuing). But what I would like to know is what reason exists, if any, by which a rule which seems to be proper to apply to the over-sea trade should not also apply to the Great Lakes trade?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And this applies also to river trade.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right. What reasons are so different on the rivers and on the Great Lakes as to warrant a change in a rule to apply to the sea?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Unfortunately the gentleman was not here yesterday when that was fully explained and I will explain it again.

Mr. SHERLEY. A portion of it I did hear, but not on that point.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. One reason for it is this. For instance, a great many lake vessels make a complete voyage, say, in 18 hours and I gave an illustration where they would run during the day and tie up at night. What is the use of having three shifts of firemen of eight hours each on a vessel of that kind?

Mr. SHERLEY. Very true, but quite a number of lines do run for a longer period. If you are trying to reach the matter thoroughly is not the proper way to make your amendment apply simply to those cases where the voyage is of such a short duration as not to make necessary three shifts, and is it fair to offer an amendment that excludes all lake traffic, some of which extends over a period of days, as I personally know?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is not upon the hypothesis which the gentleman assumes, but here is the further condition that most of the Lake traffic vessels are of modern construction, and the arrangements in regard to firemen are different from what they were in the old vessels. In other words, the firemen on the Great Lakes vessels now have communication with the outer air which makes it a far easier place to work.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman mean by modern construction? I have spent a great many summers on the Great Lakes, and I personally have seen on the Lakes vessels in the carrying trade 10 and 15 and 20 years old.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, answering the gentleman's question in regard to the length of voyage, I agree that he is right. I would accept an amendment of that kind. I tried to get an agreement that we might insert a provision such as he suggests. I do not think it ought to apply to the Great Lakes at all, but on the other hand it certainly ought not to vessels that only make short runs.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then do I understand the gentleman's position is that he indorses it as necessary on the high seas and not on the Great Lakes?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I do not think——

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman thinks it is proper on the high seas, would he not be ready to concede that there are certain conditions on the Great Lakes where it is proper?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Conditions are not the same. You take it on the Pacific coast, between Seattle and San Francisco, and the vessel owners have adopted the three-watch system, as I understand, and there is no objection to it. Those voyages are longer and somewhat rougher. Now, it seems to me if it was for the advantage of those vessels on the Great Lakes, it would have been adopted. The local inspector——

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman is going on the assumption that whatever is desirable from the standpoint of humanity will be adopted by the owners of the vessels, then all legislation is unnecessary, and we may leave to their enlightened judgment all reform.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. About two years ago we passed a bill leaving these matters to the local inspector, and that law has worked well, and if this amendment was adopted it would still be that way. And I think we are making a mistake when we attempt to legislate in detail, because there is such a difference in vessels. Few of them run under exactly the same conditions, and when we attempt to legislate we are going to oppress one vessel and let another escape proper manning.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think there is any greater difference in the character of vessels engaged in the trade on the Great Lakes than in the character of the vessels engaged in the trade on the ocean?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington No; I do not think there is any greater difference.

Mr. SHERLEY. If you can apply uniform rules to vessels of widely different types on the sea, why can not you do it on the Lakes?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The difference is, that the vessels which run on the sea make long voyages, and they do not make these short stops as on the Lakes, and they are of different construction.

Mr. SHARP. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that I have lived nearly all my life on the Great Lakes, and I represent a constituency that lives at one of the greatest harbors on the Lakes. It has been my pleasure, and duty as well, in a business capacity to sail the Great Lakes for 20 years, at least, past. And I wish to say for the gentleman's information that if he will look up the statistics of the amount of tonnage that is carried on the Great Lakes, I believe I will be sustained when I say that at the present time, and for years past, fully 85 per cent, if not 90 per cent, of all the tonnage that is now carried on the Great Lakes involves a voyage of from two to three days, running from Lake Superior points and upper Lake Michigan points, where we have the great ore carrying trade, down to Lake Erie ports one way, and returning with coal cargoes from the Lake Erie ports, carrying the coal of West Virginia, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, to the upper Lakes, involving a return trip of two or three days. So, it seems to me, that so far as the number of watchmen are concerned, it should apply to the Great Lakes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. So far as distance is concerned, it should.

Mr. SHARP. But it takes it at least two or three days to make those voyages, involving 85 to 90 per cent of the total amount of tonnage.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has expired, and all time on this amendment has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. May I ask, in reference to the language of the bill, what is the definition of "merchant vessel"?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Merchant vessels, as I understand it, are vessels that carry cargoes or passengers for hire.

Mr. MANN. Would this provision, "merchant vessels while at sea," cover a little passenger tug operating upon an inland lake?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It would not cover anything except those of 100 tons register or more, except fishing vessels, yachts, and whaling vessels. It covers all others going to sea and on the Great Lakes, because the Great Lakes have been held to be the sea, and I so interpret it.

Mr. MANN. Would it cover vessels on rivers and off the Great Lakes and on small inland lakes?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It does not cover vessels on the rivers or on the harbors of small inland lakes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman understand that a navigable river is considered the same as the sea in the sense of admiralty and maritime law? That is my impression, although I have not looked at it recently.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is not so, so far as the term "sea" in legislation is concerned. The term "sea" in legislation is held by the navigation authorities to consist of the oceans and the Great Lakes, and other distinctions are made, although they are under the general maritime regulations, in rivers and harbors.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt the gentleman has looked the matter up, and I am satisfied with his statement. I know recently we have passed some laws for the purpose of applying certain conditions to the Great Lakes where before the law only applied to vessels on the ocean, and my impression was that it said "while vessels were at sea." I may be mistaken. It may have said "upon the ocean."

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, I have not had occasion for some time to look at this matter, although I once served on the committee reporting this bill. The old English rule was that admiralty jurisdiction extended only to waters where the tide ebbed and flowed. Very early in the history of America the question came up as to whether that rule was any longer applicable, and it resulted in a different rule being adopted, because navigable waters of great size were then known where the tide did not ebb and flow. They abolished the old rule, and held that the rivers and lakes that were navigable came within the maritime jurisdiction of the Constitution.

Without wanting to question the gentleman's statement, my impression was rather pronounced that language such as this would embrace the navigable rivers.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the maritime jurisdiction under the Constitution——

Mr. SHERLEY. Admiralty——

Mr. MANN. Covers all except the control over interstate commerce. Admiralty jurisdiction is another proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. "Admiralty jurisdiction" is what I meant to say, if the gentleman will permit, instead of "maritime jurisdiction."

Mr. MANN. I wondered how far the term "at sea" would cover. I can readily imagine that there are many cases where vessels may be navigating upon some small lake for the purpose of carrying passengers, so that the Government would have control over it where it would not be possible to have three watches, or even two watches.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman; and, on the other hand, there are certain cases on the rivers where they ought to have three watches; and what I think we ought to do is to make the bill plainly indicate what it embraces.

Mr. MANN. It may not be possible to do that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois had the floor, and his time has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] moves to strike out the last two words. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The Lake Carriers' Association that has been mentioned here, from the information I have, is dominated by the Steel Trust. According to recent reports made by the United States Bureau of Labor and other information that we have, we find that the United States Steel Corporation employees are to the extent of about 60 per cent un-Americanized foreigners.

It has been stated here by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] that Mr. Olander does not represent the great majority of the Americanized workingmen working now on the Great Lakes. By the way, I happen to know Mr. Olander, and I believe he is one of the ablest and most sincere and honest men that I have had the pleasure of knowing in the trades-union movement. Due to the fact that there has been a strike on for some years, there is no doubt that the Steel Trust, dominating this Lake Carriers' Association, will practice the same methods to defeat the movement that is being made in the endeavor to keep the workmanship on the lake vessels up to the standard that ought to be maintained in America.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Not yet. Therefore they will endeavor to defeat the effort that is being made by the men whom Mr. Olander represents, the men who have selected him to carry out what they desire, the men who voted by a large majority for a strike when they were working as a class on the lake steamers. Some might say that this was Mr. Olander's strike; that he ordered it. But let us be fair about the matter and know how these strikes occur.

The strike was ordered by the men who were working on the lakes themselves, because this monstrous Steel Trust had got control of the affairs of the Lake Carriers' Association, and therefore had created conditions that were unbearable to the men who were working there. And when anyone says that Mr. Olander does not know what conditions American workmen would want on the lake steamers in this country, he is certainly making a statement that can not be borne out by the facts.

Mr. HOWLAND. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. HOWLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman what authority he has for the statement that the Steel Trust dominates the Lake Carriers' Association? My information is—and I think it is fairly accurate—that the Steel Corporation controls only 20 per cent of the tonnage represented by the Lake Carriers' Association.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I do not know whether the evidence would be sufficient to state here as a matter of record, but I have information that is sufficient for me, and it leads me to believe that the Steel Trust, with its interlocking interests, has got control not only of the vessels on the sea, but is getting large control to-day of all the business in this country, even of the banks and other big corporations of the country; and while it may not apparently control this directly, yet the men who are directors of the steel company have interests sufficient in the vessels that are operating on the lakes to have control of and direct the course and action of that association, and they do it, in my judgment. There is not a shadow of a doubt in my mind but that that is true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. That is the motion that is pending now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The last three words, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], who is in charge of this bill. Yesterday I spoke of some imperfections in the bill, as I believed them to be, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has raised a question which induces me now to ask as to the uncertainty of certain expressions in the bill. Yesterday, in one paragraph we had reference to "seamen" in one line and in another line to "sailors," evidently intended to mean the same thing, but leaving an opening for a legal quibble should one or other be interpreted in law to mean something that the other did not mean.

Mr. ALEXANDER. When this amendment shall have been disposed of, I am going to ask that the word "sailors," in line 10, be stricken out and the word "seamen" inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask the gentleman now in regard to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who asked about the meaning or interpretation of the term "merchant vessels."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, it is right in connection with the very point that the gentleman is raising, with regard to the word "seamen" as confused with the word "sailors." In the first instance the word "seamen" is used because that includes all of the employees on the vessel. In the second instance the word "sailors" is used because that includes only the deck hands on the vessel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I question whether that would be borne out in nautical nomenclature.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Those are the meanings of the terms.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I doubt that, because later on in the bill you propose to define an able seaman, and you distinguish him from a sailor, and you distinguish him from a fireman.

But that is not the question I wanted to ask the gentleman from Missouri. The gentleman from Illinois asked as to merchant vessels. Now, on page 2, in the first section, in line 9, reference is made to "all merchant vessels of the United States." I draw attention to that particular characterization. On page 3, the very next page, in the second section, reference is made to the master or owner of "any vessel." That is in line 8. That is the second proposition. You change front in the two sections as to the nature of the vessel, or as to the characterization of it.

On page 4, in the next section, in line 7, you refer to "a vessel of the United States."

You have three distinct characterizations of vessels in those three separate sections. What is intended? Do you want to frame this bill so that when a question is raised in court, a horse and wagon can be driven through the bill? Why in one relation do you say "seaman" and in another "sailor"? Why in one section do you say a "merchant vessel," which is presumed to be as defined by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], and in another section say "any vessel," which may include anything from a bateau up to a leviathan of the ocean, and in a third paragraph say "a vessel of the United States."

Later on I propose to raise the question as to what you mean by "a vessel of the United States."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In the first place, each of these sections applies to different purposes. One section is only meant to apply to merchant vessels. The next section that the gentleman refers to——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am afraid the gentleman will have difficulty in harmonizing those three suggestions.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The next section is meant to apply, so far as wages are concerned, to all vessels, whether they are of the United States or of foreign countries. Then the next section is meant to apply purely to vessels of the United States; so that each has a specific purpose.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What do you mean, then, on page 4, line 7, when you say "every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive," and so forth? You intend that that shall apply to every seaman; but, apparently, according to the language of the bill, you make it apply only to those seamen who are employed on "vessels of the United States," which I assume to be vessels owned by the United States. If you mean vessels of United States register, then you mean merchant vessels, but you do not say so.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman wants light on that question, I will read him the definition given by the navigation laws.

Mr. MANN. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. ALEXANDER. From our navigation laws, page 15, section 2:

> Vessels registered pursuant to law and no others, except such as shall be duly qualified according to law for carrying on the coasting or fishing trade, shall be deemed vessels of the United States, and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels; but no such vessel shall enjoy such benefits and privileges longer than it shall continue to be wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States or a corporation created under the laws of any of the States thereof, and be commanded by a citizen of the United States. And all the officers of vessels of the United States who shall have charge of a watch, including pilots, shall in all cases be citizens of the United States.

So that "a vessel of the United States" is a vessel that belongs to a citizen or a corporation of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentlemen in charge are satisfied to have this bill come before the House in such form that in three successive paragraphs a vessel is defined in three different ways, of course the responsibility is upon them. I assume they intend to do the seamen some service.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is not the question now pending before the House. It will be well enough to take it up when we come to it. I will say to the gentleman that I did not frame the language of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LITTLEPAGE). The gentleman from Illinois ask unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I find in several places in the statute references like this:

> SEC. 4318. Every vessel of the United States navigating the waters on the northern, northeastern, and western frontiers otherwise than by sea shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as other vessels.

There are a number of places where that expression occurs. I call the attention of the gentleman to it, in connection with this expression "at sea," to ask him whether or not he is perfectly clear that this expression in the bill will cover the Great Lakes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I will state frankly to the gentleman I do not think it will.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I recall looking the matter up as to time, and my impression is that we found a statute that provided that the Great Lakes should be considered the same as the sea. I am not able to place my hand on the statute at the present time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again read.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order. We can not have it read at a time when the House is dividing.

Mr. MANN. But the House has not yet commenced to divide.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that if the gentleman from Michigan persists in making the point of no quorum I shall move the previous question on this bill to its final passage, and he will defeat the very purpose that he has in view.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One Member has risen; not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I will withhold it for the present.

Mr. MANN. What becomes of the amendment, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, line 10, after the word "States," insert the words "navigating the ocean or any lake, bay, or sound of the United States," and strike out in the same line the words "while at sea."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. We have on Puget Sound boats that will leave a city at 6 o'clock in the morning and return at 6 o'clock the same night and tie up for the night. Would that include a vessel of that kind?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am inclined to think that the words "at sea" would include vessels on the Great Lakes, but it would not include vessels on rivers.

Mr. WARBURTON. This is on Puget Sound.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 3, line 4, at the end of section 1, insert the following:
> "Or to vessels or steamers of 1,500 tons register and tonnage operated on the Great Lakes."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of this amendment I desire to address the House for a few minutes. I wish to say that the condition on the Lakes is entirely different from that on the ocean. We have a large number of steamers on the Lakes that are owned by independents, some of them by men who have their life savings locked up in an investment of 1,000 tons to 1,500 tons, as against those vessels carrying ten or twelve or fourteen thousand tons of ore. Under the most rigid economy it is impossible to expect a man to operate a vessel of 1,500 to 2,500 tons cargo in competition with one carrying ten or twelve or fourteen thousand tons. The clause in the bill requiring an additional fireman on the smaller class of boats is simply imposing a further burden upon the owners of those boats, and in the end will result in confiscation. During the consideration of this bill we have had a discussion of the trusts by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]. He refers to the great Steel Trust. I had supposed that the discussion of the trusts coming from that side of the House would have been left in the rear.

During my service in this House for a number of years I have heard that side of the House clamoring and charging the Republican Party with being the mother of trusts and corporations, and yet you bring in here in this bill under section 1 a clause which, if it shall become a law, will have the effect of building up one of the most arbitrary trusts that exists in the country to-day. You will simply dictate to the smaller class of vessels the number of men that they shall carry on their ships, the number of hours that they shall work; and if they are not able to comply with the terms of the bill they are simply to take their boats to the dock and let them lie there to rot. I think the time has come when the Democratic Party can afford to be fair and just to all people. You are now before the country hoping to carry it this fall—and I hope you will be buried so deep that you will never know that you have run a ticket—and it is a poor time for you at this section of the game to commence defending the trusts or to legislate here in establishing and constructing a trust. I am opposed to this bill. I am in favor of the workingman, and I am in favor of the sailor. I have had to do with sailors on the Great Lakes for the past 40 years, and I never yet have had a strike or a complaint from any sailor that I have ever had as to his wages or treatment; and as to the statement that the Steel Trust controls the tonnage on the Great Lakes, that is a mistake, and the gentleman who made it was in error.

There are a large number of men who are known as independents that have their independent steamers on the Lakes, and so far as the Steel Trust is concerned they are the strongest competitors to-day with the small boats. They have been paying liberal wages, and more so than any class of vessels that operate on the Great Lakes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. McMORRAN. I decline to yield at this time. I have had men in my employ for a number of years, men who started on the deck as deck hands, who are to-day commanding some of the steel steamers on the Great Lakes, drawing salaries from $2,000 to $2,500 a year, and they are men who are well worthy of the positions they occupy, and I think that the steel company are entitled to the credit of the efforts they have made in behalf of the work of the sailors on the Lakes. They have provided every comfort that could be provided in good steamers, and I think it comes with ill grace from any Member on that side of the House to charge the Steel Trust with being unfair to labor. I have no interest in the Steel Trust; I only wish I owned some of their stock.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me it is just as hot in the boiler room of a 1,500-ton vessel on the Lakes as it is on the ocean. It is just as hot when the vessel is owned by an individual or a small corporation as it is when it is owned by a trust.

Mr. McMORRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McMORRAN. Do I understand the gentleman to say it is just as hot in the fire hole of a vessel of 1,500 tons register on the Lakes as in a steamer on the ocean?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Of the same size; yes.

Mr. McMORRAN. Of the same size. Well, I am referring to 1,500-ton vessels.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I say it is just as hot in the boiler room of a 1,500-ton boat on the Lakes as in the boiler room of a 1,500-ton boat on the ocean.

Mr. McMORRAN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that on the ocean a vessel carries a pressure of from 175 to 225 pounds, whereas on the Lakes they carry a pressure of from 80 to 125 pounds?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I know that both on the Lakes and on the ocean they carry various pressures.

Mr. McMORRAN. Does the gentleman maintain that the fire hole of a vessel carrying 225 pounds of steam is just the same as one carrying from 75 to 125 pounds of steam?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No; I am not making that contention. I am simply making the contention that, with the various pressures carried in various vessels on the Lakes as there is on the ocean, with the same pressure being carried on the same size vessel, it is just as hot in the boiler room of the one on the Lakes as it is in the one on the ocean.

Mr. McMORRAN. One other point in that connection. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the rate of wages paid on the Great Lakes, say on a 1,500-ton vessel, is much larger than that paid on the same size vessel on the ocean?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In the coastwise trade?

Mr. McMORRAN. No; in the foreign trade, or the coastwise.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The great bulk of the traffic on the Lakes is coastwise trade.

Mr. McMORRAN. That is true.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The rate paid in the coastwise trade on the Pacific coast is higher than the rate paid on the Lakes.

Mr. McMORRAN. On the Pacific coast it is; on foreign service it is not, as I understand it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is true; but it is nearly all coastwise trade on the Lakes. There is not any reason why this amendment should be adopted, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. You wish to ask the Speaker?

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from Michigan, and I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan, who offered the amendment, if he does not intend to include vessels of less than 1,500 tons? As it reads, it reads 1,500 tons and that tonnage alone.

Mr. McMORRAN. I did intend to cover 1,500 tons or less.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, after the word "tonnage," by inserting the words "or less."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the gentleman offers the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "tonnage," the words "or less," so that the amendment will read "or to vessels or steamers of 1,500 tons of register tonnage, or less, operated on the Great Lakes."

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. Does not the question now arise on the McMorran amendment?

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman has an amendment he wants to offer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to know the parliamentary status. Has the McMorran amendment been voted upon?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I have no amendment at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the McMorran amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, at the end of line 18, insert "or for the saving of life and property aboard other vessels in jeopardy."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I presume there will be no objection to the amendment. I think it was an oversight on the part of the committee. They certainly would not prohibit these sailors from working to protect life on other vessels as well as on their own. As I understand it, a master at sea is compelled to go to the rescue of any vessel that is in danger, and it seems to me no one should object to sailors under those circumstances assisting in giving help to the rescue of property or lives. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I have no serious objection to the amendment, although experience has shown it is not necessary to have that in our legislation, because there has been little or no necessity for it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Occasion did arise in the case of the Titanic. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOUSTON). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, on page 2, line 20, I offer another amendment. After the word "do," insert "in the judgment of the master." As it reads now it says:

While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or legal holidays.

That is a provision to which I have no objection, but if it is unnecessary, in whose judgment? Somebody has to pass upon it; I recognize the master might exercise arbitrary power or make some mistakes, as every other man. On the other hand, he is supposed, certainly, to have equal judgment and to be as fair as a seaman. As a matter of fact, the records show that the seamen follow the sea but a very short time. I think on the average, according to the statement of the chairman of the Seamen's Union on the Pacific coast, the average time is about three years. I do not think it would be safe to leave it to the judgment of any man on board as to what he shall do. I do not know where you should put this power of deciding as well as with the master, and I think that is where it ought to go. Anything that is necessary in the judgment of the master the seaman should be required to do. The way it is it invites trouble. If the master gives an order and the seaman refuses to obey it, he will be discharged. You simply invite complications and trouble for both the master and the crew.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, after the word "do," insert the words "in the judgment of the master," so that the lines will read: "No seaman shall be required to do, in the judgment of the master, any unnecessary work on Sundays," etc.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the amendment practically destroys the purpose of the bill. If you leave the matter of what constitutes necessary work solely to the judgment of the master of the vessel, then the same condition will continue as exists now, when men are required to go on doing all kinds of ordinary work on Sunday, and the seamen will be prevented from having the usual week's day of rest which is usually provided for in all other classes of work. The question should be left, first, to the master to determine as to whether he considers it necessary or not; second, to the sailor or seaman to determine whether he considers it necessary or not, and, failing to agree, then the power rests with the inspectors to determine which of the two is right under the circumstances.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what limitation he would put on the words "unnecessary work on Sundays"?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I can scarcely place any limitation on the words "unnecessary work" unless the specific piece of labor proposed to be done is up for consideration. Then I would be in a position to pass judgment upon whether or not it was necessary or unnecessary.

Mr. WEEKS. Is it going to be necessary to take these matters into court in order to determine what is necessary labor in all specific cases?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Oh, no.

Mr. WEEKS. How is it going to be determined then?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is a likelihood that the men would be able to reach an agreement. But as it is now if one of these men refuses to perform this work on Sunday, or as it would be if this amendment were adopted, he would come under the law and would be penalized for his refusal to perform that labor, and that, too, not when the vessel is endangered or at sea, but when the vessel is in a safe port.

Mr. WEEKS. Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that a vessel is at sea and the master finds it is necessary to wash decks and the men do not do so, what is going to determine it?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This does not apply to vessels at sea. At sea the word of the master is supreme, because there is a community of interests in which the safety of all who are there is involved and, consequently, there must be some supreme authority. And the supreme authority when at sea is vested in the master of the vessel. This clause only applies at times when the vessel is in a safe port.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WEEKS. May I have the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill? In lines 10 and 11 the limitation as to the number of watches is stipulated, at least two watches for the deck force and three watches for the engine-room force. Why were the words "at least" left out so far as the engine-room force is concerned? There may be a division into six watches, for instance. That would be a natural division of watches at sea—men standing watch for four hours.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have no objection, if the gentleman desires to offer an amendment of that kind, to an amendment of that kind being offered.

Mr. WEEKS. It seems to me that would be a natural limitation to be placed in the law.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The sole reason for its not being there was the presumption that three watches would be as many as the firemen would likely be divided into.

Mr. WEEKS. It is very frequent that men stand in watches for four hours, then go off watch, and then go on again.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. All over the world the watch is recognized to be four hours, so that when you speak of a "watch" you speak of four hours.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; but the dog watch is two hours.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Well, there are no dog qualifications in this bill.

Mr. WEEKS. There are dog watches on all oceans, as the gentleman knows if he has investigated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert, in line 11, page 2, after the word "into," the words "at least," so that it will read "and the firemen into at least three watches."

Mr. HARDY. We have no objection to that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "into," insert the words "at least," so that the line will read "and the firemen into at least three watches."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, now that we have a real seaman on his feet, I would like to inquire what the term "watch" means. What is the legal definition of the term "watch" as used here?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, when seamen want legal definitions they go to a lawyer to get them. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I thought sometimes they went to a sea lawyer. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. But if the gentleman wishes a practical definition of the term "watch," I would say that it is the term or period that a man stands duty at a stated time.

Mr. MANN. It is not a term of duty? This refers to the duty of the man.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is almost synonymous with the term "shift" on land, so that it will be two shifts and three shifts, respectively, but the length of that shift is recognized universally as four hours.

Mr. MANN. It is quite certain that you could not have four watches of 8 hours each in 24 hours. Are the men to be divided into three watches?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The men are to be divided into three watches, or three shifts, so far as the firemen are concerned, and into two watches, or two shifts, so far as the sailors and deck hands are concerned.

Mr. MANN. Is there any way to alternate from day to night and vice versa under the divisions of this bill, having divided the men into three sets? I use a term that we understand. That is what you mean by this bill. Then you provide that they shall alternate. Is there any way by which a man who served this week at night shall serve next week in the daytime under the terms of this bill? I fear not.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This is a matter of mutual arrangement.

Mr. MANN. It is not a matter of mutual arrangement when the law fixes it. This bill says "divided into three watches, which shall be kept on duty alternately." Now, I take it that it is a common practice to shift the time of service of men on board vessels at sea as well as elsewhere. I ask what it means, because I know the gentleman would not wish to destroy that.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman will see, if he examines into it, that it will naturally shift for itself.

Mr. MANN. I was at sea the other day, and as well as I could figure it out I figured it out that it would not shift for itself.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the gentleman in charge of the bill will state that no complaint has ever come before his committee on account of a recent change in the hours of service on board ships. Every master arranges his hands so that some will perform some night service and some will perform day service, and at different times in the night and in the day.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do not think this will prevent that.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think it will prevent it, and I do not think there is a complaint that it has not been done.

Mr. SHERLEY. In the earlier discussion of the bill did not the gentleman state that this provision would not apply to vessels engaged in a voyage lasting less than 16 hours? Manifestly there ought not to be any need for three shifts of men in vessels that are so engaged—for instance, in a run of four or five hours' duration.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think if the bill does not exclude that class of vessels an amendment ought to be offered which does exclude them. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. My opinion of the situation is this: That the watch or the shift being of four hours' duration, and the shifts alternating, naturally there would be less than three shifts where there were eight hours or less.

Mr. SHERLEY. No. There would be less than that many watches, but not less than that many shifts, using the term "watches" as designating time and the term "shifts" as designating classes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. "Shift" and "watch" are almost synonymous terms.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let us not juggle with words. I do not care what the gentleman calls it. I care not whether you call it a "shift" or a "watch." In point of fact here is what happens: A certain class or group of men work four hours. They are spoken of as a "watch," and sometimes, as the gentleman said, as a "shift," though frequently you speak of a watch as referring to time and not to men. For instance, when you speak of the "dog watch" you may not refer to the character of men or to the number composing that shift, but you refer to the time during which that watch lasts. Now, if the time of the voyage is such as to consume four or five hours only, you may have, by this provision in the bill, required the maintenance of three groups of men, whereas in point of fact the time employed by the vessel is not sufficient to use those men.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I would state to the gentleman that it is not clear that that would be the case, but I would have no objection whatever to an amendment which would make it clear that this would not apply to vessels running eight hours or less, if it applied to vessels running more than eight hours. It should apply only to vessels running more than eight hours.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let us see whether it should. If a vessel runs only 9 hours or 10 hours, why should there be three shifts when you can have two alternating, and in no instance can a man work more than 8 hours? That is what is in the gentleman's mind, and in no instance will a man work more than four hours consecutively. I do not want, on the spur of the moment, to offer an amendment that may not effect a remedy, but it is clear to my mind that unless the letter of this law is disregarded you have created a condition where you will be required to have three shifts of men on vessels that may not be engaged in a voyage long enough to need more than two shifts.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose you have a crew of firemen numbering 90 men, and you divided them into three groups. One group of 30, we will assume, take one of the watches. Half the group will be employed for 4 hours, and then will go off duty, and the other half will go on. That would be an 8-hour watch. Then we will take the next group of 30, one half of whom would go on for 4 hours and the other half for 4 hours. The third group would do the same thing. According to the language of this bill, dividing the watches as they are proposed to be divided in the bill, no man would work more than 4 hours out of the 24, as I understand it. I do not suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to make the language of the bill such that a man would work less than 8 hours in 24.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is entirely in error. Under this bill each man is 4 hours on and 8 hours off in every consecutive 12 hours.

Mr. MADDEN. He would not be under the three-group system.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes; the three-group system is what I have reference to. Each group of men would work 4 hours and be off 8 hours, and then work 4 hours again and be off 8 hours, so that in each 24 hours every man would work two periods or watches of 4 hours each.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not figure it out that way. Perhaps the gentleman has figured it out.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps the difficulty comes from the use of the word "alternate," when you speak of three groups. The words "alternate" and "alternately" are generally used as applying to two groups.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is there any penalty provided for a violation of this section, except the right of the seaman to quit?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no other penalty except the right of the seaman to quit, and to get his wages when he does quit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is pending.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. ALEXANDER) there were—ayes 32, noes none.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 10, after the words "States the," by striking out the word "sailors" and inserting the word "seamen."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, that is offered simply to make the term conform to the other parts of the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the word "seamen" mean firemen also?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not necessarily, because seamen are especially defined later on in the bill as men who must have served three years.

Mr. MANN. Is not the expression in the bill later on "able seamen," and does "able seamen" mean the same as "seamen"?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; it does not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I should suppose there was some purpose in the bill, when it provides that in order to be an able-bodied seaman——

Mr. MANN. I do not think it says "able-bodied seaman." I think it says "able seaman," which means one thing and "seaman" means another, and a sailor may be something else.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What are firemen?

Mr. MANN. Firemen are seamen.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should think so.

Mr. KENDALL. Does the word "sailor" include all of them?

Mr. MANN. No; "sailor" does not include firemen, but "seaman" would.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Firemen are specified, but the word "sailor" occurs several times where the word "seaman" is intended. I merely want to correct the phraseology of the bill. I supposed it was the intent of gentlemen to have this bill uniform. If you want to leave this question open, I am satisfied, but I want to correct the bill so that there may be no question as to the meaning of the word "seaman."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, we are more interested in this bill being right and in having the correct meaning expressed than we are in the bill being uniform. We are more interested in its being easy of interpretation than we are in having the verbiage according to the ideas of any one man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman simply confuse the question when he leaves it open? It may mean a sailor or a seaman who has seen three years' service.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No; the confusion is in the gentleman's mind, in that he does not draw the distinction between what is a seaman and what is a sailor. The word "seaman" includes all of those who are employed on board, while "sailor" only includes the deck hands.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean that a sailor distinguished from a seaman need not have three years' experience?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It means that able seamen shall have three years' service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean that a "sailor" may go on board at any time, and do the work of an able seaman, without requiring three years' service?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No; but there are sailors who can do that.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that the provision of the bill regarding able seamen requires not to exceed 65 per cent of able seamen?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The others may be seamen, and they would also be sailors, if they were doing deck work. I think there is no confusion in the term.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I should like to read the definition of "seaman" as given by the law for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MANN. What is the section of the statute which the gentleman proposes to read?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is on page 58 of the navigation laws, and is section 73:

Every person (apprentices excepted) who shall be employed or engaged to serve in any capacity on board the same shall be deemed and taken to be a seaman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under this provision here as to watches, where would the stewards and cooks come in?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I thought so. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] whether upon that interpretation of the law he still means to put a sailor in the category of an able seaman who does not have to serve three years on shipboard in order to qualify under this act? You are proposing here to improve existing law, and if you are going to improve it you should improve the imperfections of the old law, and when you are copying bad grammar I think it had better be corrected while we have a chance.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is agreed to, it means that the cooks and stewards would also be divided into two watches as well as the sailors.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And it is intended that cooks and stewards shall not be covered by this.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This does not cover the cooks and stewards.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Exactly. It covers the firemen and the sailors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 1, by striking out all after the word "earned," line 3, page 3.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this bill is entitled "A bill to abolish involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen," and so forth, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] has laid much stress upon the servitude which seamen are said to endure. There are long voyages and short voyages that seamen have to take, and when they go on a whaling cruise they take, perhaps, a longer voyage than on any other. On fishing voyages they also take long cruises, and I am at a loss to understand why the gentlemen on the other side should bring in a bill which proposes to relieve one class of seamen or sailors from involuntary servitude and still imposes it upon others whose work at sea may be more difficult. If this bill is intended to relieve seamen of any hardships they now endure, why do you except by the provisions of the bill and still leave in involuntary servitude men who are employed upon fishing vessels or men who go off in whalers and stay for a term of years? Is this bill intended to exclude the seamen who go off on those cruises? And why except yachts, especially in view of the charge made a moment ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] that the crowding down of sailors was due to the Steel Trust? Why except the yachts which, perhaps, are more largely owned by those who are interested in the Steel Trust than any other class of men? Why should those who work down in the holds of yachts be excepted from this "involuntary servitude" that is imposed upon the sailors who go down in the ships? You may say that you except a yacht owned by a millionaire because he does not take long cruises or because he furnishes some special facilities in the way of comfort and convenience for the men who do the stoking and the firing and whatever other work is to be done, or before the mast. Do you intend especially to benefit the Steel Trust millionaires who own the yachts and sail away at their own free will and keep the men down in the hold in involuntary servitude while you pretend to perform an act for the liberation of those whom you say are enslaved upon the ships carrying commerce? I want the ships of commerce to have a chance. I want the men who employ sailors to have an opportunity. I do not propose to vote them out and vote in the men who own yachts, the men who are able to sail away as they please. It seems to me that the gentlemen on the other side have made a remarkable exception in this case, that they provide that the sailor who is in involuntary servitude on the yacht of the millionaire shall not be included in the provisions of this bill, which is supposed to wipe out the last vestige of serfdom in the United States. I would like to know what the gentleman has to say in opposition to an amendment of this kind, making fish of one and fowl of another, proposing that one class of seamen, or sailors, as you have distinguished them, shall be the beneficiaries of this act and leaving in distress and abject servitude under the iron heel of the millionaire the man who sails on the palatial yacht. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I can not help thinking that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is making a nice little calico play and nothing more. This section has nothing to do with the question of involuntary servitude, as the gentleman would seem to believe, laying so much stress upon the fact that it does not apply to the millionaire-owned yacht. This section has reference only to providing for two watches of the deck crew and three watches of the firemen. The yachts are exempted from this provision, as they are from nearly all of the existing provisions of a similar character in existing law, because the employees on the yachts are generally the best cared for and least oppressed of seamen and they have never complained as to the matters involved in this section, and there is absolutely no question whatever of involuntary servitude involved in this section. The fact is that I am more tickled and amused at the gentleman's performance as to yachts than anything I know of, except when it comes to his criticism of our exempting fishing and whaling vessels from this section.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no question that these classes of seamen are being exempted from the benefits of this act.

Mr. HARDY. Oh, the gentleman can read. There is no question that the answer to his question is that the yachts are exempted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And so are those who go out in whaling and fishing vessels.

Mr. HARDY. So far as the fishing vessels are concerned, the gentleman ought to know there are thousands of poor men owning their little outfits, and to require them to have alternating watches, two watches on deck and three watches of the firemen, would be simply ridiculous.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 4530 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4530. Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive, within 48 hours after demand therefor, from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-half part of the wages which shall be due him at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has been commenced, shall load or deliver cargo before the voyage is ended; and all stipulations to the contrary shall be held as void. And when the voyage is ended every such seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall then be due him, as provided in section 4529 of the Revised Statutes: Provided, That notwithstanding any release signed by any seaman under section 4552 of the Revised Statutes any court having jurisdiction may upon good cause shown set aside such release and take such action as justice shall require: Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels while in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, to strike out from including "Provided further" to the end of the section, so that the section will not apply to foreign vessels.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, by striking out the proviso after the word "require," in line 22.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of Members of the House to the fact that by this proviso we attempt to make void contracts which are made in foreign countries between foreign citizens. Now, I submit we can go this far, that when foreign vessels are in our ports we can make them comply with any rule and regulation that exists in regard to American citizens or that protects property or to contracts made in our own ports. We can also go so far as not to enforce contracts that are made in those foreign countries. For instance, we could refuse to recognize any agreement made abroad and not compel them to be enforced and carried out in this country, but we do not have the power to declare void contracts made in foreign countries. There is a clear distinction, and we go entirely beyond our authority. In other words, in this section, as we now have it, we provide that if a foreign sailor makes an agreement with a foreign shipowner that the contract becomes void as soon as they come into an American port. We also go further. If they make an agreement that wages shall not be paid until the round trip is complete we say that that contract will be void. Now, I think we are going beyond our power. If we had the power, I do not think there is any necessity for it. I can see no reason why we should tell foreign nations how they should pay their sailors. We are attempting to do something entirely out of our power when we declare a contract made between two citizens of a foreign Government, legal in that Government, is void because they come into our ports. I think that section ought to be stricken out. Under the law as it now stands the words in line 13, "and all stipulations to the contrary shall be held as void," is not in it. The change that is made from the present law is the insertion of those words and the provisos.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the only change between the old and the new law?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The only change between the old law and the new law are the words "and all stipulations to the contrary shall be held as void," and the provisos which make it apply to foreign ships, and it does seem to me that this House ought to have some consideration for its judgment; that we ought not here to vote for provisions in bills we know we have no authority to enforce. We should have some regard for the comity of nations. For one I do not want to go on record as voting for a law to make void a legal contract made between two citizens of another country as long as it does not affect our safety and the interest of our country.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman insists this is the only part of the provision we could enforce:

Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels, etc.

That is what the gentleman refers to as what we could not enforce, and that is because of our relations with nations.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And the further stipulation:

Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive, within 48 hours, after demand therefor, from the master of the vessel to which he belongs, one-half part of the wages which shall be due him, etc.

Suppose an English sailor had made a contract when he started in regard to his wages. That provision makes that contract void. And we go beyond that. We not only declare the contract void, but we declare we will enforce a violation of that contract when it comes into our port. If part of the money has been paid under such contract our courts will compel its repayment. The seaman should have the power of the courts of the United States to enforce payment that is in direct violation of the legal contract he had made in his own country with his countrymen.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. When a ship comes within the 3-mile limit of our shores or lands and takes advantage of our laws and docks at our shores, does that ship come within the jurisdiction of our courts?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly. It comes within the jurisdiction of the courts, and I have never attempted to deny the fact. We have authority over that vessel and we can compel that vessel to obey our rules and regulations that affect the interests of American citizens, but I am making this distinction, that the United States has no authority to declare void a contract made between two citizens of another country that is legal in that country which in no way affects American interests. We go a step further. We not only declare that contract void, but we provide that the foreign sailor may go into court and invoke the power of that court to carry out something that he agreed not to do and about which we are not in anyway concerned.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Supposing one of the Canadian railroads makes a contract with one of its employees that the employee shall not recover for damages in case of injury. Then they come into the United States with a train and the employee is injured. The employee sues under the liability act which we passed. Does the gentleman think the fact that the contract was made in Canada instead of the United States could be urged as a bar in that suit? Is there any distinction between that case and this? In other words, we do not declare the contract is void, but we declare it can not be plead in defense of the action.

Mr. BUTLER. This law applies where the case is brought.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is true enough; that would be the law of the United States.

Mr. MANN. So is this when it is passed.

Mr. PICKETT. The case suggested by the gentleman from Illinois is where the cause of action occurs in this country.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman suggests a case where we would enforce the law of the United States, but this is a case where you will declare void a contract legal in a foreign country in which we have no interest between foreign subjects.

Mr. MANN. We are enforcing the law of the United States. We are permitting the man to sue for wages that are due him, but do not permit evidence that he is not to have the wages to be proof presumptive in the matter.

Mr. BUTLER. In the case the gentleman puts to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] we declare, notwithstanding the contract was made in Canada that there should be no recovery, there can be a recovery here.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly; we make that stipulation in regard to our own people here. But that is a law where they recover under the laws of the United States. In this case you are declaring void a contract made abroad and carried out entirely abroad or on a foreign ship, between foreign citizens, which is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield? If the gentleman will turn to page 78, section 95, of the navigation laws, 1911, he will find the law relating to advances and allotments of wages. In the first subdivision it says:

It shall be and is hereby made unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same or to pay such advance wages to any other person.

In subdivision "b" it says further:

It shall be lawful for any seaman to stipulate in his shipping agreement for an allotment of any portion of the wages which he may earn to his grandparents, parents, wife, sister, or children, etc.

Subdivision "c" provides what other rights he shall have. Then in subdivision "d" it says:

No allotment note shall be valid unless signed by and approved by the shipping commissioner. It shall be the duty of said commissioner to examine such allotments and the parties to them and enforce compliance with the law.

Then in subdivision "e" it says:

No allotment except as provided for in this section shall be lawful.

In subdivision "f," and this is the subdivision to which I wish particularly to call your attention, it says:

This section shall apply as well to foreign vessels as to vessels of the United States; and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for a similar violation: Provided, That treaties in force between the United States and foreign nations do not conflict.

If we may regulate advancements and allotments of wages, why can not we regulate the payment of wages, too?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, line 7, after the words "on a," by inserting the word "merchant."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this is intended to meet the criticism I made a little while ago. Here you provide for a vessel of the United States, the inference being, and perhaps the legal definition being, that the vessel is owned by the Government of the United States. The bill does not say a vessel of American register; it does not say "merchant vessel." I suggest the word "merchant" would fit the situation and make the bill uniform.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. It is apparent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] does not understand the purpose of this section or the purpose of the other section that he has had reference to in his discussion here to-day. This section is meant to apply to all vessels of the United States, not vessels owned by the United States, but vessels of the United States, and the law as read a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] clearly defined it, and that is the language that should be used when applying to vessels owned by citizens of the United States. This is meant to apply not only to merchant vessels of the United States, but to all vessels of the United States, whether they are merchant vessels or others.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I offer the amendment merely to perfect the bill. If the gentleman does not want it, all right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while I do not think the amendment is necessary, I wish before the debate on this bill is closed that the gentleman in charge of the bill, or some other gentleman, will put into the RECORD a clear definition of what a merchant vessel is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The law was read a little while ago.

Mr. MANN. Section 4311 of the Revised Statutes defines what a vessel of the United States is. I take it that there is no definition in the statute as to the meaning of the term "merchant vessel," and it seems to me it would be desirable to have the definition in the RECORD if not in the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. My definition, at least, of the term is in the RECORD, in reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman a while ago to state that the term "merchant vessel," in section 1, covered certain vessels not under 100 tons burden.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. What I said was that a merchant vessel was a vessel carrying passengers or freight for hire. That was my definition of a merchant vessel. Then one of the sections specifically exempts vessels of less than 100 tons, which would exclude merchant vessels as well as other vessels.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, line 13, after the word "ended," by inserting the words, "Provided the voyage between ports shall cover a period of 48 hours."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] a moment ago suggested that I ought to study this bill a little more carefully that I might better understand it. The gentleman speaks from his point of view. I speak from mine. I am interested in the development and improvement of labor conditions. I believe those conditions will be improved as we improve the opportunity for men to do business in this country. I believe that a sailor ought to be paid everything that is due him for his services, but I believe there is another side to that question, namely, that some encouragement should be given to the man who invests his money in enterprises and employs the sailor. Now, I assume that the gentleman upon the other side wants to be as fair to the employer as to the employee and wants to see, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] indicated the other day, the employer and employee walking hand in hand.

Up to this time in this discussion it would appear that that labor which the gentleman seems to speak for wants to strike at the employer. I do not understand that to be the purpose of this bill, and I do not understand it to be the purpose of the gentleman. I believe that the man who employs labor ought to have equal consideration in a bill of this kind with the laborer himself. They ought to work together.

Now, this bill presents certain features that make it impossible for a man operating a small vessel to continue in business. There are conditions in this bill that, put into effect, may deprive the small shipowner of the right to exist, leaving all the shipping business to be done by the great capitalists and the trusts, on the one hand, and those who regulate the affairs of organized labor, on the other. I want to see the man who operates a small ship have the same chance to employ somebody as the man who operates the trust-owned ship.

In this particular instance I have offered an amendment which has in view the practicability of this section of the bill. It is proposed here that a seaman shall have his wages at every port on 48 hours' notice to the master of the vessel. Pray, how is that going to work along the Atlantic seaboard, where the vessel leaves the port of New York in the morning and arrives at the port of Philadelphia in the evening, or leaves the port of Philadelphia in the morning and arrives in the port of Baltimore next day? Forty-eight hours do not elapse. Is it the purpose of this bill to have the man employed to do certain work upon the vessel nagging the master on a 12-hour journey? I submit that where these vessels do not cover in their trips a period of 48 hours, this provision is entirely impracticable.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know of any such circumstance, where the run is less than 48 hours between such points, where the trip is only 12 hours?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I know of many such trips. A vessel leaves Baltimore at a certain hour and arrives at Philadelphia 12 hours later. Under this bill the seaman could keep demanding his wages every 48 hours all along the Atlantic coast from Boston to Fernandina, Fla., on a voyage, stopping at ports every 12 hours.

I submit there are imperfections in this bill that make it objectionable in many respects. I want to see my colleague from Pennsylvania do everything he can to benefit the seamen, because I join with him in the effort he is making to upbuild labor. The Lord knows the honest seaman works for his wage and ought to have it. I do not want to see the gentleman put the seaman in such a position that he shall be in constant war with the captain and shall have a chip on his shoulder all the time, when they ought to be pulling together.

Yet under the terms of this bill you would have this condition arise all along the coast, and on the Great Lakes from Buffalo to Duluth.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] stated in reference to section 1 that it did not apply to vessels of less than 100 tons burden.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that that provision was in the section. I read the provision over when the gentleman made his statement, hoping to find it, and I have read it over again and have not found it, and if it is in there I would like to have the gentleman tell me where it is. If it is not there, I would like to have him say whether or not, as a matter of fact, there is any other provision which, in the gentleman's opinion, would limit section 1 to vessels of 100 tons burden or over?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No. There are some sections where the limitation is 100 tons, but the only limitation in section 1 is that it does not apply to fishing or whaling vessels, or to yachts.

The SPEAKER. Debate on this amendment has expired.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOWMAN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question in relation to the point just made by my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE. I think there is a good point made there. It is not even necessary that the wages should be paid at the port, within 48 hours, while the vessel is lying at that port. It occurs to me that if a man wanted to make trouble, or if a man had been drinking, he might ask for his money at each port, either on the coast or at every port on the Lakes, perhaps 48 hours apart. He might make a demand for his money, and every 48 hours his money would be coming to him. I think it would be easy to add to the provisions in the bill language to the effect that the voyage should cover so many days specifically.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the provision in the bill requires 48 hours' notice before the money can be paid—that is, before its payment can be enforced after it is demanded. In my judgment that protects the employer on short runs, and he has the further protection that there is nothing to compel him to retain that individual in his employment if that individual annoys him.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the gentleman is satisfied with the language, I am.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, line 25, after the word "enforcement," by inserting the following: "And provided, That nothing herein contained shall operate to admit any person in violation of the immigration laws of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak on the amendment for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, there are bills pending in this House now affecting immigration, and a test is to be made, if we are to understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] aright, and if there is any real steam behind the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY], as to whether immigrants shall be admitted to this country who can not read and write. I am in favor of properly restricting immigration. The criminal, the infirm, the helpless, the pauper, and the insane ought to be kept out of this country; but the man who can not read and write, who comes here for a worthy purpose and desires to take advantage of the opportunities offered by this country to his forefathers and to assume the same responsibilities, should not be barred solely for the reason indicated.

Here is a provision which proposes that alien seamen, whether they can read or write or not, may come into this country and have the advantages of all the courts of our land, without making any provision whatever for those citizenship obligations which the rest of us have to assume. I desire to say that if this provision is allowed to stand without the amendment which I have offered, a sluiceway will be opened for men to come into this country who do not conform to the immigration regulations of the United States—men who may be criminals, men who may not be fit for citizenship in the United States—and it seems to me this is the time to insert a precautionary provision, so that men who are neither sailors nor firemen, but who assume to come in as such, though at heart and in experience and of record they may be crooks, shall not come into the United States in violation of those laws which impose restrictions upon all others.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand the gentleman offers an amendment at the end of line 25, on page 2, and that section 4530 deals altogether with the wages of seamen. The amendment is not germane, but I will not make a point of order against it. It is absolutely foreign to the subject matter of the section.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UTTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question for information. This bill applies to coastwise and lake steamers alike, does it not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the intention.

Mr. UTTER. Then suppose a steamer leaves Buffalo, stops at Cleveland, goes along and stops at Detroit. At each place a seaman could demand half his wages, and they must be paid within 48 hours?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not say so. It says he must give 48 hours' notice.

Mr. UTTER. But the seaman has the right at each place to demand the proportion of his wages due him at that time, which must be paid in 48 hours?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; if he wants part of his wages at that port he must give 48 hours' notice.

Mr. UTTER. He must give 48 hours' notice, after he comes to port, that he wants half his money within 48 hours.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The vessel, under the circumstances the gentleman states, would not remain at one port 48 hours.

Mr. UTTER. The section does not say anything about a vessel remaining in port 48 hours.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; it says if he wants his wages in that port, he must give 48 hours' notice.

Mr. UTTER. No; it says he must ask for his wages at that port, and that they must be paid him within 48 hours.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I can not agree with the gentleman's construction of the language.

Mr. UTTER. It says simply that he is entitled to receive his wages within 48 hours after demanding them. It does not make any difference whether he is on the sea, or a river or lake. When the 48 hours are up he is entitled to his wages.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I regret that I can not agree with the gentleman's construction.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will oppose the pro forma amendment. I suggest to the gentleman that while it is true apparently that a seaman could demand and on a series of demands be entitled to one-half of his wages at Philadelphia and another one-half at the next port that he reached, although it might be reached within a few hours, the probable result would be that he would get all of his wages and get the boot.

Mr. UTTER. I am not looking for trouble for anybody. I am simply calling attention to the possibilities that may arise under the law.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 4559 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4559. Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first and second officers or a majority of the crew of any vessel, while in a foreign port, that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment, or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not or have not been during the voyage sufficient or wholesome, thereupon, in any of these or like cases, the consular or a commercial agent who may discharge any of the duties of a consul shall cause to be appointed three persons of like qualifications with those described in section 4537, who shall proceed to examine into the cause of complaint and who shall proceed and be governed in all their proceedings as provided by said section."

Mr. WEEKS. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking a question. Why, in line 5 of that section, is the limitation made to the first and second officers? Why not any officer of the ship?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will turn to page 102 of the navigation laws, 1911——

Mr. WEEKS. I have not the volume at hand.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will read it; the law is in these words:

Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first or second officer and a majority of the crew of any vessel while in a foreign port, that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea—

And so forth. The change made in the bill is this: It provides that—

Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first or second officer or a majority of the crew while in a foreign port.

We retain the language of the section, except we change "and" to "or" and provide that the first or second officer or a majority of the crew may demand an inspection of the vessel; it will not require the concurrence of the first or second officer for a majority of the crew to secure an inspection of the vessel.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the language in the law is unfortunate. The vessel may be a large one, with four or five officers. There is no reason it should be limited to the first or second officer. It should cover all vessels and all officers. I want to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill (I am not going to offer any amendment) that I think he is going too far in limiting this to the first and second officer or the crew.

I think if he had provided that the crew, indorsed by an officer, could do this, and made a limitation of that character, the provision would then be suitable, but in its present form it does not strike me as wise, because a vessel may be held up for a long time on what may prove to be a trivial objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, of course the first and second officers of the vessel are the most responsible officers, and hence they are clothed with greater authority. The only change we make is this, that the first or second officer or a majority of the crew on the vessel, if they regard the vessel to be in an unsuitable condition to go to sea, may require an inspection.

Mr. MADDEN. You use the word "or" instead of the word "and."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. Under the existing law, although the crew act as a unit in demanding the inspection of the vessel, claiming it is unseaworthy, they can not get that inspection unless their demand is also concurred in by the first or the second officer, and it was to relieve them of that embarrassment and place it in the power of the crew or a majority of the crew to demand an inspection, whether the first or second officer demanded it or not, that we amended the law in this respect.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I would not limit the restrictions, if I had it to do, which would prevent the sending of a ship to sea which was in any way unseaworthy. I am entirely in accord with the gentleman's desire in that respect, but let me call his attention to the fact that he is leaving in the hands of a majority of the crew a possibility of holding up the sailing of a ship for what may be a considerable time, and if that is done every time a ship fails to sail it means material loss not only directly but indirectly, because the ship may have on board stores which may be spoiled in the delay. It seems to me there ought to be some limitation added to a majority of the crew in order to bring about the purpose which the gentleman desires and which will mean safety to shipowners as well.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under the statute as it exists that limitation is in the form I have stated—that the majority of the crew, with the concurrence of the first or second officer, may demand an inspection—but the bill provides that a majority of the crew may demand this inspection although the officers may not concur in the demand. The sailors claim this right, as their lives may be imperiled by the unseaworthiness of the ship.

Mr. WEEKS. I would be quite content if it were left to a majority of the crew, indorsed by one officer.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the existing law, and we have amended it for the reasons stated.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In the gentleman's experience at sea, does he think it would be a wise provision for us to place it by this law in the power of the crew alone to demand these inspections in the foreign ports? The gentleman will notice that this applies only to a foreign port.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, my judgment is that this is an ill-advised step, and the gentlemen who are fathering it will live to see that it is so.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that the existing law provides that a survey may be made upon the demand of the first or second officers and a majority of the crew, but it may not be made upon the demand of a majority of the crew alone. The owner of the vessel has his special representatives in the officers of the vessel. The crew has no protection whatsoever, except from the representatives of the owners of the vessel. All that a member of the crew has in this world as a rule is his life. That life is placed in jeopardy when he goes to sea in a vessel which is unsafe, and when a majority of the crew are of the same opinion that the vessel is unsafe, whether the officers, the representatives of the owners, concur in that opinion or not, justice to those seamen requires that the survey should be made, and hence we propose the change.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if any case has ever been brought to the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania where a crew has represented a ship to be unsafe and the ship has gone to sea and any accident has come to it?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There has not; and, so far as I am concerned, I am not anxious that it should be demonstrated to me by an accident that it is necessary that we should have this kind of a law.

Mr. WEEKS. But it does seem to me that when we place it in the hands of men who are simply temporarily serving on a ship to hold it up under conditions which may be very destructive to property, we ought to have some substantial reason for it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. We have had some claims made here on the floor of this House during this debate that the Titanic was not soundly constructed; and if she was not soundly constructed, then she was not seaworthy. If that be true, then a majority of the members of her crew ought to have had the right to have asked for a survey of that vessel.

Mr. WEEKS. But that vessel should have been surveyed and those matters determined in her home port before she sailed. It is true, undoubtedly, that the Titanic was not as well built as was the Great Eastern, which was constructed more than 60 years ago. She is said not to have had longitudinal bulkheads up to the water line, which was faulty construction, but she should have been inspected by English inspectors before she was allowed to sail. That is a very different proposition from inspection in foreign ports where the ship may be tied up.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is not at all foreign to the right of the seamen to have a survey of the vessel. Their lives, the only thing they have, are at stake, and when a majority of them concur in the opinion that the vessel is unsafe they ought to have the privilege of having a survey of that vessel.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this provision goes much further than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] has stated. It does seem to me the gentleman proceeds on a wrong theory. All of his arguments are that there is an antagonism and a war between the officers and the crew. While he talks about the fact that the sailors have only their lives, if the ship is unsafe, it is also true that the officers have at stake their lives just as much as do the sailors, and they are just as much interested in safety as are the sailors.

The men who own the vessels certainly have some interest, and they are represented only by the officers; so you place it entirely within the hands of the seamen, and the owner has no right whatever. If it was only a question of safety, I would not object to it; but let me call the gentleman's attention to another thing. He talks about the safety of the vessel. No one thinks a vessel ought to go to sea when there is any question about its safety, but this provision places it within the power of the seamen for various other reasons to tie up this vessel, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has pointed out. It says "that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea, because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment"—there is no objection to that—"or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not or have not been during the voyage sufficient or wholesome; thereupon," and so forth.

Now, you go so far as to place an American vessel in a foreign port entirely in the hands of the seamen who have no interest in that vessel. You take away from the officers any command over the matter and the owner of the vessel is not represented, and you tie up and delay that vessel not because she is unsafe, not because of insufficient manning, but because the provisions or stores have not been satisfactory not only upon the outgoing voyage, but also on the voyage on which she came in. I think that is not fair legislation.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the vessel is unsafe or if it is insufficiently manned or if it has insufficient stores, there is no power in existing law or no power in this proposition to compel the master to send that vessel to sea; but if it is in that kind of a condition and the master wants it to go to sea, there is no power at the present time that can protect the sailor from going to sea with that vessel unless one of the minor officers agrees with the majority of the crew that it is in that condition.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman pleases. In this very bill we provide that these seamen can immediately leave the vessel—not only leave the vessel, but can demand their wages and can not be compelled to go back upon that vessel. Now we give the seamen the power to leave, to secure their wages which may be due to them, to make it impossible to place them back on the vessel, and this is in a foreign port. I do not think you are doing any good by making this kind of a provision. Now, remember, this is in a foreign port. If it were in an American port it is a different proposition, but in a foreign port it rests entirely upon the crew. I think that the law as it stands is a proper law and that provides that a majority of the crew and one officer, either the first or second, must make the complaint.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 12, by striking out, after the word "cases," down to and including the word "consul," in line 14, and inserting the following: "The consul of the United States at such foreign ports."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this section as it stands proposes that complaint shall be made to the consular agent or the commercial agent, and if left in that form it leaves the consul of the United States out of consideration. Commercial agents are not very numerous in foreign countries and are growing less, but evidently the purpose was that those who had complaints to make should make them to an officer of the United States, who in this instance would be the consul of the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The only change in section 4556, as amended, is the change of "and" for "or" in the instance the gentleman has stated. That is the only change in that section. That has been the law for many years. It is in the act of December 21, 1898.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the existing law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Exactly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I raise the question for the benefit of the gentlemen who are advocating the bill—and in all its good features I would like to support the bill—whether we had not better amend existing law while we have the opportunity to do it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not see any necessity for doing so, and I can not appreciate the merit of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where does the complainant go when he has to go to the consular agent or to a commercial agent? Why not say he shall go to a consul of the United States? As it reads now he may go to a commercial agent of any country. We have very few commercial agents abroad, and if you want the men to get redress for their grievances, or if you want to give them a fair hearing, let them go to the consul of the United States. If the law has been ambiguous heretofore, let us say so.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I call the gentleman's attention to the section. [Reading:]

Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first or second officer and a majority of the crew of any vessel while in a foreign port, that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment, or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not, or have not been during the voyage, sufficient and wholesome; thereupon, in any of these or like cases, the consul, or a commercial agent who may discharge any duties of a consul, shall cause to be appointed three persons, of like qualifications with those described in section 4557, who shall proceed to examine into the causes of complaint, and they shall be governed in all their proceedings and proceed as provided in section 4557.

Now, if you will turn to section 4557, you will note that it provides as follows:

The judge or justice in a domestic port shall upon such application of the master or commander issue his precept—

And so forth.

This has been the law for many years, and there has been no complaint about the procedure. The law is very clear.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the entire section existing law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Except in the particular I have mentioned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call attention to line 16, about in the middle of the page, where it says, "who shall proceed to examine into the cause of complaint and who shall proceed and be governed in all their proceedings as provided by said section." Now, with all those "proceeds" and "proceedings" that is existing law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have read from section 4557, page 102, navigation laws of the United States, 1911.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You propose to amend existing law, and I have thought that this would be the time to do it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say for the gentleman's information that the only change there is in this section from the existing law is the word "and," in line 5, which is changed to "or," and the word "or," in the eleventh line, which is changed to "and."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I offer another amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 17, after the word "complaint," by striking out all up to and including the word "proceeding," on line 18, and inserting the words "and be governed."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if, having an opportunity to correct the law, the gentleman does not care to do so I will not press the matter. I submit that this is a change that can be very well made. It affects the phraseology of the bill and makes it effective. As the law now stands, if it is the law, and as this paragraph stands, it is tautological and unnecessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation," approved March 3, 1897, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That on all merchant vessels of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, except yachts, pilot boats, or vessels of less than 100 tons register, every place appropriated to the crew of the vessel shall have a space of not less than 100 cubic feet and not less than 16 square feet, measured on the floor or deck of that place, for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein; such place or lodging shall be securely constructed, properly lighted, drained, heated, and ventilated, properly protected from weather and sea, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from the effluvium of cargo or bilge water. And every such crew space shall be kept free from goods or stores not being the personal property of the crew occupying said place in use during the voyage.

"Every steamboat of the United States plying upon the Mississippi River or its tributaries shall furnish an appropriate place for the crew, which shall conform to the requirements of this section, so far as they are applicable thereto, by providing sleeping room in the engine room of such steamboat, properly protected from the cold, wind, and rain by means of suitable awnings or screens on either side of the guards or sides and forward, reaching from the boiler deck to the lower or main deck, under the direction and approval of the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, and shall be properly heated.

"All merchant vessels of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act having more than 20 men on deck must have at least one light, clean, washing place. There shall be provided at least one washing outfit for every 2 men of the watch. The washing place shall be properly heated. A separate washing place shall be provided for the fireroom and engine-room men, if their number exceed 10, which shall be large enough to accommodate at least one-sixth of them at the same time, and have hot and cold water supply and a sufficient number of washtubs, sinks, and shower baths.

"Any failure to comply with this section shall subject the owner or owners to a penalty of $500."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out, on page 5, line 25, the words "yachts, pilot boats, or."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 25, by striking out the words "except yachts, pilot boats, or."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is simply to define the words "merchant vessel," because, under the definition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], merchant vessels are those which carry passengers or cargo for hire, so that a yacht or a pilot boat could under no circumstances be construed to be a merchant vessel. The words I moved to have stricken out were the words "yachts, pilot boats, or" and not the word "except."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the gentleman intends to compel that there shall be 120 feet space for each seaman on yachts and pilot boats?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not at all. I simply mean that under the definition of merchant vessels yachts or pilot boats can not come in, and therefore there is no use of having them in this section.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. If he can find any definition of a merchant vessel, he can do more than I can.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am taking the definition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the difference between a merchant vessel or any other vessel is the difference between a merchant vessel and a war vessel.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is precisely the reason I am offering this amendment. The chairman of this committee has defined what the committee understands by the words "merchant vessel." He has defined a merchant vessel to be any vessel which carries cargo or passengers for hire. Now, a yacht or pilot boat can not be considered as a merchant vessel under that definition.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Was it the gentleman who had the bill in charge or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] who gave the definition?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I thought it was the gentleman who had the bill in charge. The amendment that I offer is to strike out the words "yachts, pilot boats, or," so that it will read:

That on all merchant vessels of the United States the construction of which shall be begun after the passage of this act, except vessels of less than 100 tons' register.

If the gentleman's definition is right, then there is no way of excepting yachts and pilot boats.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I never gave a definition of the words "merchant vessel." That definition was given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. LONGWORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I understood that it was given by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that he will not accomplish his purpose by the amendment. It says:

Except yachts, pilot boats, or vessels of less than 100 tons register.

Now, if a yacht should be engaged in the business of carrying passengers, accepting the definition of the gentleman would except it from the provisions of this section.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman mean that the 100 tons register applies to yachts?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It applies to yachts without reference to their tonnage.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not understand that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And it applies to pilot boats as well.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, line 13, by striking out the entire sentence beginning with the word "every," on line 13, and concluding with the word "heated," on line 23.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I think this sentence is worth reading, as showing how carefully the bill has been drawn. It begins:

Every steamboat of the United States plying upon the Mississippi River or its tributaries shall furnish an appropriate place for the crew.

That is a fine thing for a steamboat on the Mississippi to do. The "steamboat" is charged "to furnish an appropriate place for the crew," and it has to conform to the requirements of this section. Now, the steamboat gets its instructions. Its duty is, so far as applicable, to provide sleeping room in the engine room of the steamboat. Think of it! Down on the Mississippi River the boats coming out of New Orleans, with the negroes on bales of cotton, their tongues hanging out for want of breath, assigned by the steamboat to the engine room—an engine room which is "to be properly protected from the cold, wind, and rain." And this is in the interest of the deep-sea sailor. Sleeping room in the engine room of such steamer on the Mississippi is to be "properly protected from the cold, wind, and rain by means of suitable awnings or screens on either side of the guards or sides and forward."

What this means somebody who has written the bill will have to interpret. The section proceeds further:

Reaching from the boiler deck to the lower or main deck, under the direction and approval of the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, and shall be properly heated.

Think of these poor seamen, these dark-hued fellows, toiling away down near New Orleans on the bales of cotton, hanging onto the screens and sleeping in the engine room because it is so cold in that section of the country. [Laughter.] And the steamboat is to do all this "under the direction and approval of the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, and shall be properly heated."

Mr. Speaker, I have moved to strike out this paragraph. It seems to me it would take even more than a Philadelphia lawyer to properly interpret this paragraph into a benefit for the poor sailor down on the Mississippi River, lolling along there on his bales of cotton. I believe it ought to be straightened out before we go much further. It may be that this paragraph is borrowed from existing law, and should not be changed. If so, I will submit, as I have in other instances, to the will of the majority of the House. But I respectfully submit that the gentleman ought not by law to impose on any steamboat any such obligation as is imposed upon it in this paragraph. We ought to put that responsibility on some one, perhaps on the master of the vessel or on the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, or perhaps we might strike out the word "master" altogether, since it is a term which is offensive to organized labor, and insert instead of it the term "captain," which would be a little more American and a little less suggestive of that serfdom which this bill is supposed to remove.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this paragraph ought to go out, or else the committee ought to submit an intelligible amendment to it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] reminds me very much of the story they tell of Henry Labouchere, the editor of the London Truth, who conducted a query column in his paper. One of his correspondents asked him to reply in the query column relative to the grammatical construction of a certain sentence, and Labouchere replied, saying that language was created for the purpose of conveying thought, and if the language conveyed the thought it was sufficiently grammatical for all practical purposes. "For instance," he said, "if I said 'There are a great many damned fools in the world,' or 'There is a great many damned fools in the world,' my meaning would be clear just the same." [Laughter.] The language that the gentleman objects to is taken from existing law, and this bill simply continues that without change.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman still insists that the steamboat shall provide these quarters, does he? The gentleman still insists, when he goes into court in behalf of these sailors, that the steamboat shall be responsible?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the language is the language of existing law and that the courts have interpreted that law; and no layman can ever determine in advance what the interpretation of a court will be upon the language in any bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have pointed out the difficulty that may confront the gentleman when he gets to court.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do so for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to that portion of the paragraph that provides that there shall be a space of "not less than 100 cubic feet and not less than 16 square feet, measured on the floor of the deck of that place, for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein."

I have no objection to that provision. I have been in favor of that portion of the bill for a good many years. But in the report filed by the committee there are statements made with reference to the space furnished by American vessels that I think in justice to the American vessel owners ought to be corrected. In the first place, foreign vessels are not measured in the same way that we measure ours. In measuring space in a foreign vessel the wash rooms and some other spaces are taken into consideration. That is not true with us.

I further want to say, for the benefit of the House, that most of the American vessels comply with the provisions of this bill already. There is no objection to the provision going into the bill, so far as I know, but I do not think that a statement of the kind that is made in the report, that would indicate that American vessel owners have less regard for their sailors than have the vessel owners of other countries, ought to go undisputed when it is not correct.

Mr. WEEKS. I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of asking a question for information. Why is the Mississippi River and its tributaries included in this bill and not other rivers?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We did not amend that feature of the law. The essential amendment to the section relates to the crews placed on vessels. There are many features of the section which we do not undertake to amend at all, which are existing law.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not know but there might be some reason that I did not know why this should apply to the Mississippi River and its tributaries and not apply to other rivers.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We did not consider that feature at all. Answering the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], I do not know why he should be so sensitive of the feelings of the shipowner. All through the consideration of this bill his plea has been for the shipowner. It seems to me that the time might come when he could have a word to say for the sailor.

It is only in recent years that the laws of foreign countries have increased the crew space of vessels to 120 cubic feet per man. There was no shipowner before our committee who objected to this increase of crew space, if it applied to vessels hereafter to be constructed. They all said that if we should make it applicable to vessels now in the service it would involve serious expense and injury.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Did I understand the gentleman to make the statement that I was opposed to this provision?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; but I say the gentleman's explanation was entirely unnecessary.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I called attention to the statement in the report, which is not correct.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The statement in the report is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is correct as far as it goes, but it does not show all the facts. It does not show that there is a different method of measurement between this country and other countries, and it did not state that the shipowners had no objection to the amendment, which fact the gentleman has just admitted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no evidence before the committee to show that there is a different rule by which the space in foreign vessels is measured.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. BURLESON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, for the purpose of placing therein the speech made before the Democratic national convention at Baltimore by Hon. John W. Westcott, of Camden, N. J., nominating Gov. Woodrow Wilson for President, and the seconding speeches of Hon. A. MITCHELL PALMER, of Pennsylvania, and Hon. THOMAS P. GORE, of Oklahoma. These speeches are all short. I spoke to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] about submitting this request, and he said that he would make no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection if I understood the gentleman correctly. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked me to see that nothing went in by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman from Washington that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said it was his purpose at the same time, if my request was granted, to ask unanimous consent himself to place something in the RECORD, and I told him that, as far as I was concerned, I would make no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. With the understanding that that was the agreement——

Mr. BURLESON. I now ask that the same privilege be extended to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I ask for myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas also asks that the same privilege be extended to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection in the world to the insertion of speeches of this kind, but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that on a recent occasion when a request was made on this side an interrogation came from the other side of the House as to whether the speeches were of a political nature. If the line is to be drawn, of course that alters the situation. I do not object that speeches of this kind shall be inserted, but I do draw the attention of the House to the fact that I had this experience myself when I asked permission to extend, and was asked by gentlemen on the other side if the remarks were of a political nature, and had to give assurances that they were not.

Mr. BURLESON. Of course these speeches are of a political nature.

Mr. WEEKS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if a request is made from this side to print the speeches that were made at the Chicago convention no objection will be made?

Mr. BURLESON. Absolutely none, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman include a request for permission for me to extend some remarks on the battleship Oregon?

Mr. BURLESON. As far as I am concerned I will make no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman includes in his request a further request that the gentleman from Oregon have permission to print some remarks concerning the battleship Oregon.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to consume so much of the time of the House. I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 4596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4596. Whenever any seaman who has been lawfully engaged or any apprentice to the sea service commits any of the following offenses he shall be punished as follows:

"First. For desertion, by forfeiture of all or any part of the clothes or effects he leaves on board and of all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned.

"Second. For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his vessel or to proceed to sea in his vessel or for absence without leave at any time within 24 hours of the vessel's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of the voyage, or for absence at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his vessel and from his duty, not amounting to desertion, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than two days' pay or sufficient to defray any expenses which shall have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute.

"Third. For quitting the vessel, without leave, after her arrival at the port of her delivery and before she is placed in security, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than one month's pay.

"Fourth. For willful disobedience to any lawful command at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture from his wages of not more than four days' pay, or, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for not more than one month.

"Fifth. For continued willful disobedience to lawful command or continued willful neglect of duty at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons, on bread and water, with full rations every fifth day, until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture, for every 24 hours' continuance of such disobedience or neglect, of a sum of not more than 12 days' pay, or by imprisonment for not more than three months, at the discretion of the court.

"Sixth. For assaulting any master or mate, by imprisonment of not more than two years.

"Seventh. For willfully damaging the vessel, or embezzling or willfully damaging any of the stores or cargo, by forfeiture out of his wages of a sum equal in amount to the loss thereby sustained, and also, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment of not more than 12 months.

"Eighth. For any act of smuggling for which he is convicted and whereby loss or damage is occasioned to the master or owner, he shall be liable to pay such master or owner such a sum as is sufficient to reimburse the master or owner for such loss or damage, and the whole or any part of his wages may be retained in satisfaction or on account of such liability, and he shall be liable to imprisonment for a period of not more than 12 months."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I now renew the request that I made a moment ago to extend my remarks in the RECORD, for the purpose indicated, and ask that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] may have the same privilege extended to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to insert certain speeches in the RECORD, and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] have a similar privilege.

Mr. RODDENBERY. May I inquire of the gentleman what is the purpose of publishing these political speeches?

Mr. BURLESON. A number of Members have requested that these speeches be placed in the RECORD, and I thought they might be of interest to many other Members of the House. This nominating speech and the seconding speeches were carefully prepared speeches, and were highly creditable to the gentlemen who delivered them.

Mr. RODDENBERY. They were published in the newspapers at the time.

Mr. BURLESON. No; they have never been published in full.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I desire the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fifth paragraph, which provides for the punishment of seamen at the option of the master, who may place them in irons. A little later on in the bill it is proposed to remove all forms of corporal punishment. How does the gentleman harmonize section 8, which provides that "flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment are hereby prohibited on board of any vessel," with the fifth paragraph of the section just read, which especially provides that the captain shall have the power to place a man in irons? How can you abolish corporal punishment on the one hand and institute it on the other?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, we mitigate in part, but not altogether. We recognize the duty of a seaman while the vessel is at sea and that he shall be subject to punishment, but we differentiate between his condition then and in the event that he deserts while in port. When the vessel is at sea, if he does not obey orders he jeopardizes not only the vessel and the officers and crew but the passengers, if it be a passenger vessel, and puts them in great peril. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that the fifth subdivision of section 4596 is in the exact language of the existing law. It provides:

Fifth. For continued willful disobedience to lawful command or continued willful neglect of duty at sea, by being, at the option of the master, placed in irons, on bread and water, with full rations every fifth day, until such disobedience shall cease, and upon arrival in port by forfeiture, for every 24 hours' continuance of such disobedience or neglect, of a sum of not more than 12 days' pay, or by imprisonment for not more than three months, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The man may still be taken into custody by the master of the vessel during the voyage and placed in irons?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the existing law, so far as that punishment is concerned, is not affected by the passage of this bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It will not be.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to know whether or not the gentleman distinguishes the placing of a man in irons on shipboard from the involuntary servitude which it is proposed to abolish.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have undertaken to explain to the gentleman why it was necessary to enforce absolute obedience to lawful orders at sea. The vessel does not have any jail or calaboose. If a man violates an order at sea, and is subject to punishment, he must be restrained of his liberty, and that has been the view of the lawmaking power for all time past, and the necessity for that punishment has not ceased. At least, the committee in revising this section did not believe it wise to repeal this provision of the law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the authority of the captain on shipboard during the voyage is as absolute as it ever was?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is; and properly so, except this, that he can not flog a sailor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is abolished by this act?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is abolished by this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Vessels used to have what was called a brig, in which an unruly seaman, or one who had committed a crime on board, or who had become insane or was otherwise irresponsible, could be imprisoned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was wondering whether the committee had given consideration to the advisability of having that brig established or reestablished, so that a man might be imprisoned rather than put in irons, since the placing of a man in irons is certainly corporal punishment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the following, which is found in lines 19 and 20, on page 8:

On bread and water, with full rations every fifth day.

I want to call the attention of the House to this fact: That if you place a man in irons, you have got him pretty tight. It was the policy for years in putting a man in jail for all kinds of offenses to place him on bread and water. That barbarous custom has been abandoned, and justly so. You can not starve a man, you can not break down his vitality, and put him into condition to reform.

He will reform on a full stomach and under healthy conditions better than he will reform under starvation. Civilization has recognized that fact, and when we place a man in prison to-day we place him in irons and cells so that he can not hurt himself or others, but we still do not go to the limit that we used to of starving him to death. If a man is placed in irons, give him enough to eat. Is he not going to reform more quickly than under conditions of starvation? Will there be any question on earth about that? Is there any place in the United States where the old barbarous custom is still in force?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Suppose a situation should arise where you were at sea and the vessel was in a dangerous condition and the lives of the passengers were at stake, and in order that the vessel might be saved the seamen had to perform their duties, and they refused. Would you put the seamen in irons under those conditions and keep them well fed? I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken about the purpose of this statute. I agree with him exactly that the purpose of imprisonment usually is to reform, but here the purpose is to make the seaman perform his duty.

Mr. RAKER. And will he not be better able to perform that duty if he is well fed?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How long might it take a sailor if he was well fed to change his mind and decide to perform his duty?

Mr. RAKER. That has been the old argument from the barbarous days until we relieved ourselves of that condition by proper legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise simply for the purpose of trying to throw a little light on this question of punishment. In the Navy the putting of a man in irons is not considered corporal punishment. Flogging in the Navy has been abolished for a great many decades, and yet in certain cases men are put in irons, single and double, and they are put in irons on bread and water.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] was a little mistaken in saying that corporal punishment had not been abolished in the merchant marine. It has been.

Mr. HOBSON. That was my impression.

Mr. HARDY. The only difference this law makes is that under the existing law the master is liable in damages to a person injured by violation of the law, and not the vessel, while this law makes the vessel also liable, so as to give some real remedy.

Mr. HOBSON. I am in favor of a revision of the law——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to have my recollection set right, for I know the gentleman is informed——

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman does me great honor.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought we had abolished punishment by the putting of seamen in irons. I thought we had abolished that form of punishment by an act of Congress which was passed. I was under the impression I had voted for—I know I advocated it—the abolishing of the placing of sailor men in irons.

Mr. HOBSON. If it was, it was when I was neither in the House nor in the Navy. I do not think that is the case, Mr. Speaker. I think the gentleman will find that the application of irons, single or double, is still practiced in the Navy in certain cases, and if my memory is correct, they may be confined on bread and water for a period not to exceed seven days. Now, I will say to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] that I am not in favor of harsh punishment, and I do not want him to misunderstand me when I tell him that the evident purpose of this kind of punishment in the Navy, and doubtless in the merchant marine, has been to deter men from committing the same kind of infraction or the same kind of lawlessness rather than the reform of the particular person.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Can the gentleman imagine any tighter place that might be had than putting a man in single or double irons? Can you do any more damage to the man by starving him while you have got him in that condition? Why not feed him and keep his body and soul alive, so when he does leave or his time expires he may be a well man and go out fit for his duty?

Mr. HOBSON. That is precisely the purpose of the limitation upon the length of time in which you can keep him on bread and water. I think it is seven days. Now, a full ration every fifth day and bread and water in the meantime will prevent starving. I would add that it is conceivable that a man might object but little to confinement on full rations who would be deeply influenced by the thought of being put on bread and water. This punishment might exert a wholesome effect to deter others from committing the same offense. However, I want to say to the gentleman I am entirely in accord with him in the general movement toward the amelioration of punishment.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Is not that the same argument made when the laws were sought to be repealed, and eventually repealed, in regard to keeping men in prison on bread and water? Is it not because of the humane treatment of our prisoners, because of separating the old, hardened criminal from the young man and separating the boy from the hardened criminal, that they have reformed and are reforming them every day and getting better citizens instead of keeping them together, and does not the same reason apply to this same argument?

Mr. HOBSON. I think the gentleman has much force in what he says, and that these punishments to which the gentleman refers now were instituted chiefly when we had a harder class of citizens to deal with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. I will ask for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama for two minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOBSON. I want to say to the gentleman that the steady reform in the world has been along the line he points out, and I am heartily in favor of it, but that care should be exercised in the adjustment to meet changed conditions. I dare say that humane treatment is the best treatment in the end, but you can not make punishment the most agreeable thing that a man can have. It is very easy to conceive a man as being put in irons and double irons and nicely fed and well fed day after day, for the very purpose of getting into these encouraging and pleasing conditions.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there, because of his extended reading both in regard to the Navy and the Army. Did the gentleman ever know of a case where a man enjoyed being in single or double irons or confined to a cell, and who went there just for the pleasure of being there and getting some nice things to eat?

Mr. HOBSON. I hardly think so myself; but I can conceive how good feeding and no work might possibly have some inducement—but nevertheless I am in favor of the gentleman's general proposition. I simply wanted to throw some light on the practice in the Navy. The practice in the Navy for nearly half a century, perhaps a little more, has been to abolish corporal punishment, and yet it has been found advisable to retain confinement in the brig, and in certain cases putting in irons, single and double, and putting on bread and water. To-day, at Annapolis, our midshipmen are put in solitary confinement on bread and water.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I discover by the act of February 16, 1909, we abolished this form of punishment. Congress abolished the use of irons as a form of punishment except where that punishment is imposed by court-martial.

Mr. HOBSON. I agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. BUTLER. That is as an ordinary punishment.

Mr. HOBSON. For ordinary punishment it is not done, but it is still retained. It is among the punishments in the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. It may be part of the punishment inflicted by a court-martial.

Mr. HOBSON. For a summary or a general court?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. It is only done by a court-martial.

Mr. HOBSON. A court-martial by a summary court.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. A commanding officer of a ship can put a man in irons to restrain him.

Mr. HOBSON. Until his trial if necessary.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the amendment by striking out the comma in line 20 after the word "day," so if the original amendment is carried two commas will not be thrown together.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment, page 8, line 20, by striking out the comma after the word "day."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the amendment is only technical in character, dealing with punctuation, which might have been corrected by the enrolling or engrossing clerk, for if the original amendment is passed it will leave two commas together, which obviously is superfluous. But, Mr. Speaker, I offered my amendment to the amendment in order that I might be in parliamentary attitude for the purpose of giving my views upon the original amendment.

I have intended to offer the original amendment myself, but the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], sitting by my side, wanted to get the floor first, and I yielded to him.

Mr. Speaker, I know of nothing which would be a greater punishment to a man than starvation, unless it were death itself. In fact, starvation is a species of death, which, if kept up long enough, will result in death. Now, it is proposed by this bill to punish a recalcitrant sailor by throwing him into irons, one of the severest punishments which could be inflicted upon him, and having him in this helpless condition, where he is unable to move hand or foot, confined at the mercy of his master, it is proposed, Mr. Speaker, to inflict an additional punishment upon him by placing him upon bread and water, so that he may be punished extremely at the will of him who stands as his superior in order to force him to submission to the rules and orders of his master, however harsh and drastic such rules and orders may be.

Such punishment is cruel; it is inhuman; it is un-American; it is a relic of barbarism; and no civilized country, no intelligent people can afford to keep upon the statute books a law with such a severe penalty. Massachusetts, in her early history passed laws of torture. Witchcraft was the subject of legislation in that State, and he who was guilty thereof was tortured in the most inhuman and barbarous manner, among which was the cutting off the ears and tongue, boring holes through the tongue with a red-hot poker, and finally death was dealt out by burning at the stake, and in various other inhuman and cruel manners. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that every Member of this House will promptly vote for this amendment and wipe from the statute books this inhuman and cruel punishment of laboring men and place American shipping upon a plane of humanity and intelligence. The punishment which this amendment seeks to eliminate and repeal is akin to witchcraft torture. What reason is there for it? What man would dare inflict such punishment to-day? If none, then why keep the law on the statute books?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I was just saying that I hope that every Member of this House will see his way clear to support this amendment and place the American Congress on a plane of opposition to barbarism and those cruel practices of its time. Let us rise to the high sense of our duty by wiping from the statute books this relic of barbarism and show to the American people, who sent us here to legislate for them, that we have in our hearts the milk of human kindness even to the servant who is in irons for the purpose of reducing him to submission to the will of his master. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will state it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, there have been two or three speeches made in favor of this amendment. Is it permissible for speeches to be made against it by a member of the committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] made a speech favoring it, and the Chair thinks the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] made a speech against the amendment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offered an amendment striking out the comma, and he was recognized on that amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California can not accept it. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] opposed to the amendment?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is he opposed to striking out the comma?

Mr. FOCHT. I move, Mr. Speaker, to insert a semicolon.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to correct the Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to be corrected, if in error.

Mr. HOBSON. I believed I produced the impression on the Speaker that I was opposed to the amendment. Then I offered another amendment. I am not opposed to the amendment, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry if I produced any such impression.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I stated that I was opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. In support of my position in opposition to the amendment I wish to say to the gentleman that since the House voted down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], with reference to the illiteracy test, I would say that my view with regard to this section at least has been considerably change or modified. I would be willing, if these seamen were all Americans, that instead of bread and water it should be required they be fed on sponge cake and Borden's milk. But since the House has seen fit to vote down the proposition of requiring that these people shall be able to read and write, I am not so much concerned. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has called attention in another section to the bewildering and befogging phraseology, and I would like to ask the gentlemen who constructed this bill what is meant in section 5 "for continued, willful disobedience"? What length of time is "continued"? An hour, a day, a week, or a month?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is the gentleman aware that that has been the law for many years?

Mr. FOCHT. When you impose a sentence, however, you must be definite and specific. A court having discretion, for the first offense, may remit the sentence or suspend it; the second, by giving a prisoner 30 days; and, for the third, sending him to the penitentiary. Here you say, "for continued, willful disobedience." How long is "continued"?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That will be in the discretion of the master. The language of the laws is, "For continued, willful disobedience to lawful command, or continued, willful neglect of duty at sea, by being, at the option of the master," and so forth. The provision does not relate to procedure in court; it states when the master may discipline the seaman.

Mr. FOCHT. Then you make a Tamerlane or a Rameses of him.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Unlike the gentleman, we do not assume that the master is a tyrant any more than we assume that the sailor is a criminal.

Mr. FOCHT. You give him the power of a tyrant, and he may often exercise it, as has frequently been the case in the past. I would like to say to the chairman of this committee while I have an opportunity, that instead of spending so much time on this bill, may I ask him to say to this House and the country, with the Democratic Party in power here, why you Democrats do not bring on the floor of this House the immigration bill, that we may pass it and restrict immigration?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania treats with contempt any legislation the purpose of which is to ameliorate the condition of labor. He seems to have no sympathy with labor, judging by his impatience at the time consumed in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, yes. I live in a labor district, and will offer my public record and submit to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] where I stand and have stood on all labor questions.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. The gentleman may have to explain his declaration on the labor question on this floor here to-day.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes. I am willing to explain it here and hereafter, but the gentleman has not answered that question. The country calls for the restriction of immigration, and the gentleman and the Democratic Party refuse to bring on this floor a bill providing for it. Why does not the gentleman and his party do it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no jurisdiction of that subject. I am chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and am presenting a bill reported by that committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. In this connection and as the question, in part at least, bears on the interest of labor I wish to say that in these active, progressive times in the evolution of American social and economic life it is only fair that men in public office should indicate, at least, their tendency with respect to public action on the great issues now commanding the Nation's attention, and, if possible, reenforce these declarations by some measure of evidence of work done and capacity to represent a great people in a great office. I stand for an adequate measure of protection on all competitive articles, the amount of protection to be governed by the difference of cost of production at home and abroad, and this difference to be scientifically ascertained by a continuing nonpartisan tariff board. Free trade or a tariff for revenue only is impossible for this country. Our industries must be protected against the products of poorly paid European and Asiatic labor, and unless this is done panic and commercial ruin must inevitably, as in the past, sweep the country.

But in order that the law of supply and demand may operate unhindered the gigantic price-fixing monopolies must be brought within control or destroyed.

Amply protect our industries, but let competition within this zone of protection make the selling price to the consumer.

Restrict immigration, not only as a measure of protection to American labor but for moral and hygienic reasons.

A protective tariff must be maintained if we are to hold our commercial status and be prosperous as a Nation, for free trade means a business and labor parity with the cheap-producing and cheap-living countries of Europe and Asia. The commerce between the States of the Republic, which is greater than the commerce between all the nations of Europe, must not be sacrificed, but, on the other hand, the power and will of the people must assert itself and strangle the price-fixing monopolies. And until immigration is restricted the labor of the country can not receive that full measure of reward and benefit which protection offers the manufacturer.

Let there be maintained a tariff that will protect all competitive articles, smash the price-fixing trusts and monopolies, restrict immigration, and require the untaxed billionaires to bear their share of the Nation's burdens in equal proportion with the manufacturer and workingman; then we believe many of the ills of the country will disappear and something more akin to an ideal condition prevail for all classes.

This is my platform, and while briefly stated, I believe goes straight to the vitals of the paramount issues of this era. I enunciated these doctrines long ago. I reiterated them at the farmers' picnic in Union County last August and again as late as February 22, 1912, at Lewistown, when I was the guest and speaker at a banquet given by the Patriotic Order Sons of America. During this Congress I introduced a bill providing for the restriction of immigration; within a month I voted to tax the big billionaires; ever and always my voice and the weight of my influence have been against monopolies and illegal trusts.

For the soldier and his widow and children, for the great farming industry in contingencies like the discussion on reciprocity, in which I stood the defender of the interests of Pennsylvania farmers, for the arm of labor I have always been; for the home and fireside and the boys and girls at public school I have given, and will give, a maximum of effort and energy.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I think after this miniature maelstrom and petty storm in the House a little calm consideration will be of use. The present law provides that for continued willful disobedience to lawful commands, or continued willful neglect of duty at sea, the offender shall, at the option of the master, be placed in irons or fed on bread and water. "Continued willful disobedience" is continued as long as it continues and until it discontinues. We need not split hairs about that.

So far as placing a man in irons is concerned, that is the old law, the present law. So far as putting seamen on bread and water is concerned, it is also present law. It is, as I believe was stated by Capt. HOBSON, one of the methods of bringing to reason the unreasonable and unruly. It is deemed to be essential because while the seaman is on board a vessel at sea, the life and safety of every passenger on board and that of the whole crew depends upon his subordination to lawful authority and the preservation of order. It is absolutely necessary that the master or commander of the vessel should have some means of keeping order, and to put a third or a half of his crew, maybe, in irons and then feed them on bread and honey or on milk and honey might not be a quick way of bringing them to order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. HARDY. I do.

Mr. RAKER. If the statement made by the gentleman is correct—that is, that a third of the crew may be kept in irons and fed on bread and water for a week, and a storm comes on and the lives of the passengers and everybody on board are in danger—of course, these fellows who have been in irons for a week and fed on bread and water would not be in splendid shape to help save the passengers, would they?

Mr. HARDY. They are kept there as long as they do not obey. The seamen themselves, recognizing the importance of order for themselves and for the safety of life and property at sea, have never asked for the abolition of the bread-and-water provision.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HARDY. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The adoption of this amendment would not prevent the penalty of bread and water—the mere striking out of the words. The adoption of this amendment would have no effect on that.

Mr. HARDY. No. The provision authorizes and limits what punishment may be inflicted. The gentleman is correct; the proposed amendment would not accomplish the purpose intended, but the leaders of labor and the heads of the Seamen's Union have never asked that the bread-and-water provision should be abolished.

This is a bill in regard to which this side of the House is very much in earnest. The committee, in reporting this bill for improving the conditions and promoting the interests of seamen, do not want to jeopardize the safety of the passengers on the vessel or destroy the power of the master to preserve order while at sea.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I do.

Mr. PADGETT. A moment ago the question was asked about the use of irons in the Navy.

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. On February 16, 1909, Congress passed an act containing this phrase:

Provided, That the use of irons, single or double, is hereby abolished, except for the purpose of safe custody or when part of a sentence imposed by a general court-martial.

Mr. HARDY. That is in effect the purpose of this bill. If, while the vessel is at sea, a member of the crew becomes thoroughly disorderly and refuses to carry out the orders of the captain and becomes turbulent, he can be put in irons and kept there as long as he continues in that spirit. That is all there is in it, and it is very essential.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 4600 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4600. It shall be the duty of all consular officers to discountenance insubordination by every means in their power, and, where the local authorities can be usefully employed for that purpose, to lend their aid and use their exertions to that end in the most effectual manner. In all cases where seamen or officers are accused, the consular officer shall inquire into the facts and proceed as provided in section 4583 of the Revised Statutes; and the officer discharging such seaman shall enter upon the crew list and shipping articles and official log the cause of such discharge and the particulars in which the cruel or unusual treatment consisted, and subscribe his name thereto officially. He shall read the entry made in the official log to the master, and his reply thereto, if any, shall likewise be entered and subscribed in the same manner."

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McMORRAN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. McMORRAN. We have been here for a long time to-day. This bill involves great interests. We have been unable to keep a quorum. Is not the gentleman willing at this time that we should adjourn until to-morrow morning?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why not dispose of this section first?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McMORRAN]? Would the gentleman be willing that the bill might first be read down to section 10? There is nothing in particular in dispute to that point—to section 10, on page 11.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why not skip section 10?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. All the rest of the bill is contested.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. McMORRAN. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman proposes an adjournment. Does he think that, beginning at 12 o'clock and quitting at 4 o'clock, when this House wants to go home and the people want this House to adjourn, is sufficient time to work?

Mr. McMORRAN. Why are not the gentleman's people here?

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable. Did the gentleman refuse to comply with the suggestion to adjourn?

Mr. McMORRAN. I proposed to the gentleman to adjourn.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I was trying to ascertain if we could not reach an agreement, so that the gentleman would not need to make the point of no quorum until we reached section 10.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And I ask why should we not dispose of this section first and then proceed as far as section 10?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is what I was trying to suggest.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 4611 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4611. Flogging and all other forms of corporal punishment are hereby prohibited on board of any vessel, and no form of corporal punishment on board of any vessel shall be deemed justifiable, and any master or other officer thereof who shall violate the aforesaid provisions of this section, or either thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than two years. Whenever any officer other than the master of such vessel shall violate any provision of this section it shall be the duty of such master to surrender such officer to the proper authorities as soon as practicable. Any failure on the part of such master to comply herewith, which failure shall result in the escape of such officer, shall render the master or the vessel liable in damages for such punishment to the person illegally punished by such officer."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7157. An act to make uniform charges for furnishing copies of records of the Department of the Interior and of its several bureaus.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 4012. An act to authorize the exchange of certain lands with the State of Michigan.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7027) to prohibit the interstate transportation of pictures of prize fights, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 7157. An act to make uniform charges for furnishing copies of records of the Department of the Interior and of its several bureaus; to the Committee on Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11628. An act authorizing John T. McCrosson and associates to construct an irrigation ditch on the island of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 21477. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

LAWS RELATING TO SEAMEN.

The House resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 23673) to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen.

The following committee amendment to section 8 was read:

Page 11, line 1, strike out "of" and insert "or."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, that is the only change that there is from existing law in this section. By an error in the printing of the bill the existing law was printed without the amendment proposed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this the existing law with the single exception of the amendment changing the word "of" to the word "or"?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is the only change.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell us, then, how lines 23 and 24 of page 10 have been interpreted heretofore? The master is to surrender such officer "to the proper authorities" as soon as practicable. That may be in a foreign port or it may be in a port of the United States. I should like to know who the proper authorities are.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That expression has received the interpretation of the courts, and I think there is no doubt that it is the correct way of stating it. The only change that is made in this section is to make not only the master liable but the vessel also liable for failure to make delivery.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee is satisfied with the law as it stands, and with the expression "proper authorities" in the indefinite form that it is?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes; the committee are satisfied.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 23 of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to American seamen, for the protection of such seamen, and to promote commerce," approved December 21, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended as regards the items of water and butter, so that in lieu of a daily requirement of 4 quarts of water there shall be a requirement of 5 quarts of water every day, and in lieu of a daily requirement of 1 ounce of butter there shall be a requirement of 2 ounces of butter every day.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Has the gentleman any objection to this next section, as to allotments?

Mr. McMORRAN. That is a very important section.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It only relates to allotments. There is a subsequent section relating to able seamen. I am perfectly willing that we should stop when we get to that section, but I do not think there can be any objection to this or the next one. Neither the seamen nor the shipowners object to this. It will save a few minutes' time. I will agree to stop when we reach section 12.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There will be considerable debate on section 10.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

Mr. McMORRAN. I make the point of no quorum present.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McMORRAN] makes the point of no quorum. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] moves a call of the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I suggest that the motion to adjourn is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is always in order.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington), there were—ayes 9, noes 26.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to adjourn. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] for a call of the House.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 24, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

"9. The duty on all wools of class 1 shall be, if scoured, 19 cents per pound; if in the grease, or in any other condition than scoured, and not advanced by any process of manufacture, 18 cents per pound on the clean wool, which shall be ascertained by scouring or other tests made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That in no event shall the duty exceed 45 per cent ad valorem.

"10. The duty on all hair of class 2 shall be, if scoured, 8 cents per pound. If in natural condition or any other condition than scoured, and not advanced by any process of manufacture, 7 cents per pound on the clean hair, which shall be ascertained by scouring or other tests made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That in no event shall the duty exceed 30 per cent ad valorem.

"11. The duty on all wools and camel's hair of class 3 shall be, if scoured, 6 cents per pound. If in their natural condition or any other condition than scoured, and not advanced by any process of manufacture, 5 cents per pound on the clean wool or hair, which shall be ascertained by scouring or other tests made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That in no event shall the duty exceed 40 per cent ad valorem.

"12. The duty on wools or hair on the skin shall be 2 cents per pound less than is imposed upon the clean wool or hair of class 1, 2, or 3, as the case may be, imported not on the skin and unscoured, the quantity and value to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

LIMIT OF VISITORIAL POWERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the following order.

The Secretary read the order, submitted by Mr. SMITH of Georgia on the 20th instant, as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 24153) to amend and reenact section 5241 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and that the same be laid before the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. LODGE. The Committee on Finance met this morning, and I think is in session now. I returned to the Senate because I have a matter pending on the sundry civil appropriation bill. They were ready to take action upon that bill, but owing to the absence of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who desired to be present when action was taken, they deferred it until Monday, knowing that nothing would be done with it in the next three days.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I am perfectly willing that the order shall go over until Monday, without displacing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will go over until Monday, without losing its place. The morning business is closed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I think an amendment I offered was pending when we adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 159, after line 23, insert:

To enable the Commissioner of Fisheries to investigate the method of fishing known as beam or otter trawling and to report to Congress whether or not this method of fishing is destructive to the fish species or is otherwise harmful or undesirable, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have the report of the committee of the House and the report of the committee of the Senate in regard to the amendment just adopted printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[House Report No. 929, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

OTTER AND BEAM TRAWLING.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, submitted the following report, to accompany House joint resolution 173:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred House joint resolution 173, respectfully report the same to the House of Representatives, with the recommendation that the same do pass with the following amendments, viz:

Add, in section 1, line 5, after the word "as," the words "otter and." Also add, in section 3, line 12, after the word "appropriation," the words "not exceeding $7,500."

Amend the title by adding the words "otter and."

Until very recently the American method of catching cod, haddock, and other fish which frequent the bottom of the sea has been very largely carried on by means of set trawls. These trawls are long lines, anchored to the bottom of the sea. On each line large baited hooks are attached at close intervals.

A corporation operating from Boston, Mass., known as the Bay State Fishing Co., has introduced within the last few years powerful steam vessels, known as otter trawlers. Six of these vessels are now operating from the port of Boston. The method of fishing known as otter trawling consists of dragging along the bottom of the ocean a gigantic net, with a mouth from 100 to 150 feet in width, kept open by certain contrivances known as otter boards. It is said that these steam vessels cost about $50,000 to build, while a large-sized fishing schooner, such as is used by the Gloucester fleet, costs in the neighborhood of $15,000 when ready for sea. Besides the otter trawlers operating out of the port of Boston, some similar boats appear to have been operated elsewhere with more or less irregularity. A New York concern known as the Heroine Fishing Co. contemplates extensive operations in the same direction.

In Canada one or two such vessels have begun operations; but the Canadian Government forbids them to fish inside the 3-mile limit, and efforts are being made in Canada to prohibit the landing of fish in her ports caught by otter trawlers in international waters.

On the Grand Banks to the eastward of Newfoundland the French have been operating otter trawlers more or less in the last 10 years. A few years ago as many as 30 French trawlers were operating in those waters, but the number has very largely fallen off. It is said to have been an unprofitable venture on account of the long distance from the French market and for other reasons.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries gave a hearing on H. R. 16457, introduced by Congressman GARDNER of Massachusetts, with a view to forbidding the entry in the ports of the United States of any fish caught by otter trawlers. The committee, however, unanimously decided that an investigation of the whole question must first take place before intelligent action could be taken. Both those who favored H. R. 16457 and those who opposed it agreed that they courted an investigation of the whole matter.

In a general way the opponents of otter and beam trawling base their case on the statement that it is a method of fishing very destructive to fish life. They assert that if otter and beam trawlers are permitted to operate, it is only a question of time when the fishing grounds will be depleted.

Those who oppose H. R. 16457 contend that otter and beam trawling is a vast improvement over older methods, that the New England, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland methods of fishing are antiquated, and that the people can be supplied with a cheaper food product if otter trawlers are permitted to operate unhampered.

It seems to the committee that the question is of the utmost importance as to whether or not fishing by otter trawls is destructive of the fish species. The matter has been investigated somewhat in Europe, and both sides claim to have found material in the European reports to substantiate their views.

Dr. H. M. Smith, the Deputy Commissioner of the Bureau of Fisheries, was present at the hearings, and stated to the committee that the United States Bureau of Fisheries had given the question a great deal of thought. Dr. Smith expressed the opinion that a satisfactory investigation could be made for $7,500. He suggested that a wise method to pursue in making the investigation would be to detail an employee of the Bureau of Fisheries as an observer for an entire season on board each otter and beam trawler of the Bay State Fishing Co.'s fleet. It is understood that this arrangement would be satisfactory to the Bay State Fishing Co.

In addition to this work of practical observation, the United States Bureau of Fisheries, in case this resolution is adopted, will make a thorough study of all European reports relative to either beam trawling or otter trawling.

[Senate Report No. 903, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

BEAM OR OTTER TRAWLING.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Fisheries, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 25069:

The Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the proposed amendment to the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to enable the Commissioner of Fisheries to investigate the method of fishing known as "beam or otter trawling" and to report to Congress whether or not this method of fishing is destructive to the fish species or is otherwise harmful or undesirable, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, having duly considered the same, recommends that it do pass.

The letter of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, passing upon this proposed amendment, is attached hereto and made a part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
Washington, June 21, 1912.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Chairman Committee on Fisheries, United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 17th instant transmitting a proposed amendment to the sundry civil bill providing for an investigation by the Commissioner of Fisheries of the method of fishing known as trawling. In response to your request for suggestions as to the merits of the amendment and the propriety of its passage, I would state that the question of the destructiveness of this kind of fishing is now being agitated, and the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has held hearings on House bill No. 16457 and joint resolution No. 173, both affecting this matter, and it is my understanding that the committee will make a report favoring an investigation as a basis for any legislation that may be found to be desirable, and recommending a special appropriation therefor.

In the opinion of the Commissioner of Fisheries, it is most important that the influence of the trawl fishery on the fish supply be ascertained and proper steps taken to offset its harmful effects, if any, before the industry has attained any large proportions on our coast. There is a tendency toward a marked augmentation of the fleet of steam trawling vessels and the establishment of the fishery in new regions; and if Congress is to take any cognizance of the fishery and apply restrictive or regulating measures, this is the proper time to acquire the necessary information. Furthermore, the subject has assumed an international status, (1) because of the appearance of foreign (European) steam trawling vessels on the grounds resorted to by American fishermen, and (2) in view of the desire of the Government of Canada and Newfoundland, as informally communicated to our Government, to make an investigation and to enact requisite legislation along the lines adopted by the United States.

The department is therefore in favor of the passage of this amendment. If you desire further information on the general subject of trawling and on the attitude of the Government toward pending legislation, it is suggested that you obtain a copy of the recent hearings before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Respectfully,

CHARLES EARL, Acting Secretary.

Mr. BORAH. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after the figures "$37,200," on page 104, line 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 104, after line 2, insert:

That the failure of a homestead entryman to give notice of election of making his proof as required by the act of June 6, 1912, being an act to amend sections 291 and 297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to homesteads, shall not in any wise prejudice his rights to proceed in accordance with the law under which such entry was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if that is not a change of existing law. Is it not legislation?

Mr. BORAH. I presume it is subject to that objection, but before the Senator from Texas raises the point I should like to say a word in behalf of the amendment.

The present Congress passed an act which was approved June 6, 1912, known as the three years' homestead bill. By reason of a clause which was inserted in the act in conference great injury may come to homesteaders through no fault of theirs. I call the attention of the Senator from Texas to this proviso in the act:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall, within 60 days after the passage of this act, send a copy of the same to each homestead entryman of record who may be affected thereby by ordinary mail to his last known address, and any such entryman may, by giving notice within 120 days after the passage of this act by registered letter to the register and receiver of the local land office, elect to make proof upon his entry under the law under which the same was made without regard to the provisions of this act.

Now, if the homestead entryman does not get his notice—and I am informed that many letters are coming back into the land offices without having been delivered—if the homestead entryman does not get his notice he goes by operation of law under the new law; he has no right to proceed thereafter under the old law, under which he made his entry.

That would not be so bad if it were not for the fact that the new law requires that before proof can be made the homestead entryman shall show that one-sixteenth of his land was cultivated the second year of entry. That is a provision which was not required by the old law. So, if the homestead entryman should not get his notice, it might transpire that he would find himself under the new law absolutely incapable of complying with its terms, and thereby might lose his entry entirely. This ambiguity I am simply seeking to change by saying that his failure to elect shall not deprive him of the right to proceed under the old law.

If this does not go through in this bill, Mr. President, there is no chance for it to pass during the present session. I desire to say to the Senator from Texas and other Senators that it will undoubtedly result in many of these homesteaders being placed in a position where they may forfeit their title without any fault of theirs. I sincerely hope that the amendment may be made so that he may proceed under either law, because no one can possibly be injured if it is so. If it is otherwise, many may undoubtedly be injured. In any event the homesteader may be put to expense and worry. Let us take care not to further embarrass the home builder.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I offer the following amendment. On page 90, after line 20, I move to insert:

For the erection of a chapel at the Eastern Branch at Togus, Me., of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to be used by the inmates for religious worship, the sum of $7,500.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I feel constrained to say that while I would be glad to see those chapels at all points where they are recommended—at great Army posts and at all soldiers' homes—yet if we allow one it means either to differentiate or to allow a very large number of them. We have before the committee applications for some that would cost $30,000 to $40,000 and all the way down to $5,000. I hope we may not place this amendment in the bill, because of the embarrassment it would cause. I hope the amendment may be voted down.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, my home is within 21 miles of this branch at Togus, Me. I know something of the conditions there and also from the testimony I know of the capacity of the chapel now there. A small chapel has been erected for the purposes of religious worship which has a seating capacity of about 200.

The chapel is particularly desired by the Catholic veterans in that home, of whom there are seven or eight hundred. A priest has been assigned for their especial benefit to attend to their religious wants at the home. It seems to me that this is not asking anything extravagant.

In reply to what was said by the chairman of the committee, I have to state that it appears from the hearings that a Catholic chapel has been established at all but one of the homes for disabled soldiers in this country besides this one at Togus, and in view of the fact that there are so many there of this religious persuasion I hope the Senator will not urge an objection against including this amendment in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. On page 194, after the words "public buildings" in line 17, I desire to amend by inserting the words "fishery stations," so as to except them from the provision.

Mr. WARREN. That has already been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment has been already made.

Mr. WARREN. The money for fishery stations is made continuously available.

Mr. JONES. That is all right.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on page 60, after line 12, I move to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, after line 12, it is proposed to insert:

Fort Taylor Military Reservation, Fla.: For the filling in of the ponds and lowlands of the Fort Taylor Military Reservation, Fla., $50,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is true that item is estimated for, and the committee has been trying to get some further information in reference to it. We have not yet been satisfied about it. I do not raise the point of order against it; it may go in, and we shall look it up in conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to say, in connection with that amendment, that this is a matter of some urgency. I will not take up the time of the Senate with any discussion of it, but I should like to have inserted in the RECORD what is found on page 343 of the Estimates for Appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, under the head "Raising grade of Fort Taylor, Fla."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RAISING GRADE OF FORT TAYLOR, FLA.

For filling in the ponds and lowlands in the military reservation of Fort Taylor, Fla., submitted, $50,000.

NOTE.—The present reservation consists of 62.89 acres, and it is proposed to construct a post to accommodate six companies of Coast Artillery.

This estimate is for filling in and raising the level of the present surface, which is very low and a menace to the health of the garrison, owing to lack of drainage, which is impracticable until the surface is raised. The filling in of the ponds is deemed a matter of great urgency, for if a single case of yellow fever were introduced the disease might sweep the island. (J. B. Aleshire, Quartermaster General, United States Army.)

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say further, Mr. President, that this matter has a direct bearing upon the healthfulness of that reservation. It comprises some 62 acres, and there are lowlands in the reservation which are breeding places for mosquitoes. Our health department has often insisted that that was a matter that should be looked after. We have demonstrated that tropical diseases can be annihilated both in Cuba and in Panama, and we must take care of conditions like this in order to prevent trouble of that sort. This is a case where an ounce of prevention is worth many pounds of cure. The amendment is recommended by the War Department, and I hope it will not be put in the bill as a mere formality, but that it will stay there.

I now offer another amendment, to come in on page 19, line 16.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, at the end of line 16, it is proposed to insert:

And the limit of cost of said building as heretofore fixed by Congress is hereby increased $25,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the completion of said building within said limit of cost as thus increased.

Mr. WARREN. I make the point of order against that amendment. This bill does not undertake to change the law in regard to public buildings. The regular public-building laws provide the limit of cost, the same as in the case of the river and harbor appropriation bill. This bill simply carries appropriations under the law. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is general legislation, that it is not estimated for, and is not recommended by any committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to put in the RECORD a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in reference to this matter; and, of course, I have nothing further to submit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, July 17, 1912.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate.

SIR: In further reference to the letter addressed to you by this department under date of the 15th instant in answer to your letter of July 3 regarding the proposed new post-office building authorized to be erected at St. Petersburg, Fla., and referring to your personal inquiry regarding the requirements of the post-office business in that town, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

The postmaster in St. Petersburg has recently visited this department and has explained to the Post Office Department the peculiar conditions obtaining at that point. It appears that at certain times of the year the normal population is increased by an influx of tourists to the number of some 20,000 and that at times as many as 1,000 people crowd the post-office lobbies for mail. With 800 post-office boxes now rented there is a waiting list of 100 people who can not be supplied with boxes, and a fair estimate of a proper box equipment for the new building would be a thousand. This requires an unusually long post-office screen, and consequently a long lobby and increased floor area. The increase in ground area for the entire building now required is about 30 per cent over that originally reported. To meet this increase in size it is estimated that $85,000 should be available for the building, as stated to you in letter of July 15, but by keeping the design very simple and taking advantage of all possible economies of construction it is believed that the building could be constructed for $80,000; that is, an increase in the limit of cost of $25,000.

Respectfully,

R. O. BAILEY, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. JONES. I desire to submit an amendment to come in on page 125, line 9, after the word "penitentiary." I understand the amendment recommended by the committee at that point, striking out the proviso, was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "penitentiary," in line 9, on page 125, it is proposed to insert the following:

Penitentiary, McNeil Island, Wash.: For continuing construction of the United States penitentiary, McNeil Island, Wash., to be available until expended, all of which sum shall be so expended as to give the maximum amount of employment to the inmates of said penitentiary, $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Just a moment.

Mr. JONES. I will say that that has been estimated for by the department.

Mr. WARREN. Well, I will ask that it be again stated in order to ascertain whether the amendment follows the language of the law.

Mr. JONES. I tried to follow the language of the law.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the chairman of the committee if there was any estimate made for this purpose.

Mr. WARREN. There is an estimate for it, but I wish to see if the language corresponds with the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Let the amendment be inserted following line 11, on page 125.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is where it will be placed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 107, line 13, after the sum "$5,000," at the end of the line, it is proposed to insert:

The Yuma irrigation project in Arizona, on final settlement with the Government shall be credited, and is hereby credited, with the full sum of money heretofore paid out of the reclamation fund for levees and revetment work on the eastern side of the Colorado River, in Yuma County, Ariz.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that is a matter of general legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I confess that it is; but I should like in connection with it, if the chairman would refrain from making the point of order, to make a mere suggestion.

Mr. WARREN. I have not made the point of order, and should be glad to hear from the Senator from Arizona briefly on the merits of the case.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On the Colorado River just south of the town of Yuma, as we all remember, a break in the river caused the overflow of the Imperial Valley of California. The Government spent several million dollars in protecting the Imperial Valley by the erection of sufficient levees to hold the river within its channel. On the Arizona side of the river the lowlands were also flooded by this river when the levee was raised on the California side. So, for the purposes of protection, on that project from the irrigation fund—which the farmers themselves have to pay—they took out a sum amounting to something over $700,000 and charged it to the irrigation project. The work on the California side of the river was paid for by the Government, while on the Arizona side the farmers upon that project were required to pay this vast amount of money. My amendment looks to the credit in the final settlement with the Government of the amount they have paid, or will have to pay, out of their poor, small holdings there. That is the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask for the rereading of the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand that the amount of $700,000, which was used for the purpose of protecting the river banks upon the opposite side of the stream, was charged or is being charged up to the settlers upon the project?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Government paid for the California side of the stream out of Government funds. The river was pushed over onto the Arizona side, and a levee was necessary there to protect the lands included in the irrigation project on the Arizona side of the river. In order to do that the Reclamation Service took from the reclamation fund of that project this amount of money and built the levee. I do not think that it is a just charge against the farmers and settlers on that project, and in the final settlement and adjudication of the matter I desire provision made so that these people may have allowed as a credit their claims against the Government to the amount of money so expended.

Mr. BORAH. Was the amount expended for the purpose indicated and the work which was done a necessary part of the construction of the reclamation project?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No, sir; but I will confess that it was very essential to the project. The Government, however, owed it as much there as it did on the other side. Protection on both sides of the river was absolutely essential to the irrigation project.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Government spent the money for revetment work on the Mexican side?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On the California side.

Mr. SMOOT. I beg the Senator's pardon. I understood him to say the Mexican side.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I meant to say the California side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I appreciate the difficulties in Arizona growing out of the overflow of the Colorado River, but we can not accept matters of that kind on an appropriation bill. We have not the figures before us; we have no estimate, and therefore I make the point of order that the amendment is general legislation.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming withhold the point of order for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in addition to what my colleague [Mr. SMITH] has said, I feel certain if it were known by the Senate that the revetment work and the building of levees upon the Colorado River have been done for the purpose of holding within its channels a river which is not only interstate but international in character, this relief would be granted. The river for some miles divides the State of Arizona from a portion of the Republic of Mexico. As my colleague has said, and as has been observed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the farmers, water users, and landowners have been bearing the burden of controlling a river which is international in character. It would be unprecedented in American history to require the two or three hundred farmers in that portion of the State to have charged up against their lands the cost of keeping a raging international river within its bounds.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And a navigable river, too.

Mr. ASHURST. And a navigable river. To require those farmers to bear this burden is so palpably unjust that it is shocking to contemplate. No sense of propriety, fairness, or justice would require those farmers to pledge their lands to the amount of $7 or $8 per acre, or any other sum, for the purpose of holding within its banks a river which, as I have said, is not only interstate but international in character, and especially when the stream to be controlled is a navigable river.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator when will the adjustment and final accounting likely take place?

Mr. ASHURST. The amendment provides that when final settlement is made with the Government the farmers shall be credited with the amount expended for levees and revetment work.

Mr. BORAH. What I want to know is whether or not the accounting is likely to take place shortly?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will permit me, I have a large share of sympathy with the people in that locality on account of the conditions down there, and, so far as I am advised, I would be glad in the regular way to take the matter up and examine it, but we can not include it in a bill of this kind.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the problems presented by the conditions on the Colorado River are very serious. I have had occasion, through the committee, to endeavor to secure an amendment to this bill founded upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and a special message of the President of the United States, to make improvements on the river that would protect the California side as well as the Arizona side. I think the whole problem as affecting both sides of the river ought to be taken up and worked out in such a way as to protect the vast interests that are threatened by the overflow of the river and the submerging of great sections of land there that are immensely valuable. The committee did not feel, when the matter was presented to it, that it could take it up in this way, and I have submitted to that ruling of the committee; but I want to take this occasion to say that both the committee and Congress should keep this matter in mind, because it is a serious and urgent matter that ought to be given attention by Congress at the proper time and in the proper way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming makes the point of order against the amendment. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I send forward an amendment which I desire to offer. I will say that it does not ask for an appropriation and is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 2, after the sum "$80,000," it is proposed to insert the following:

And that so much of the act of Congress (Public Building Act) approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. U. S., 693), as authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to begin the construction of a suitable and adequate fireproof addition to the present Federal building at Winston Salem, N. C., etc., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize also all necessary changes in, and alterations and repairs of, said old Federal building, and of the heating, ventilating, and plumbing systems and elevators therein which may become necessary by reason of or incident to the extension or enlargement of said building, or which it may be found expedient or advisable to make to such old building and the heating, ventilating, and plumbing systems and elevators because of and in connection with the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of said old building; and the annual appropriations for the general maintenance of public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department shall be construed to be available for all other repairs and equipment of said building, grounds, and approaches, and the heating, hoisting, plumbing, and ventilating apparatus thereof.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I had occasion to look that up, the Senator having introduced it in the regular way. I desire to ask the Senator if he has investigated to know whether the amendment in any way involves the expenditure of any more money or raises the limit of cost for the building?

Mr. OVERMAN. It does not, Mr. President. The Secretary of the Treasury prepared the amendment himself and sent it down here before I knew anything about it and urged its passage. He said the Comptroller of the Treasury had ruled that under the existing act they could not tear down part of the old building in order to join the new building to it unless specific authority is granted.

Mr. WARREN. This amendment supplements the legislation which provided for the tearing down and the rebuilding.

Mr. OVERMAN. And the rebuilding.

Mr. WARREN. And this makes it applicable.

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill provided for the erection of an addition to this old Federal building, but under the language of the statute the Secretary of the Treasury can not tear down part of the walls in order to connect the new building with the old.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to insert in the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury relating to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order is made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DECEMBER 7, 1911.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the public-building act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stats., 693), which contains the following provision in regard to the Federal building at Winston Salem, N. C.:

"That for the purpose of beginning the construction of a suitable and adequate fireproof addition to the present Federal building and the acquisition of additional ground for the accommodation of the United States post office and other governmental offices at Winston Salem, N. C., $50,000: Provided, That this authorization shall not be construed as fixing the limit of cost of said enlargement and additional ground at the sum hereby named, but the enlargement hereby provided for shall be constructed or planned so as to cost, complete, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and additional ground not exceeding $250,000.

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, said additional ground and to enter into contracts for the construction of said enlargement within the ultimate limit of cost herein fixed: Provided, That of the said amount fixed as the ultimate limit of cost not to exceed $50,000 may be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911."

Under the holdings of the department's legal advisers as to the purport of the language above quoted, it is doubted whether the terms of this provision are broad enough to authorize the changes, alterations, improvements, and repairs of the present Federal building at Winston Salem which are either necessitated by said enlargement or deemed advantageous and economical to the Government to have done at the time said extension is constructed. It is therefore recommended that the existing legislation be so amended as to authorize specifically the changes, alterations, improvements, and repairs above mentioned.

I submit a tentative draft of an amendment for the purpose referred to which, it is believed, would be sufficient to cure the difficulty in question:

"Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of Congress (public-building act) approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stats. U. S., 693), as authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to begin the construction of a suitable and adequate fireproof addition to the present Federal building at Winston Salem, N. C., etc., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize also all necessary changes in, and alterations and repairs of, said old Federal building, and of the heating, ventilating, and plumbing systems and elevators therein which may become necessary by reason of or incident to the extension or enlargement of said building, or which it may be found expedient or advisable to make to such old building and the heating, ventilating, and plumbing systems and elevators because of, and in connection with, the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of said old building; and the annual appropriations for the general maintenance of public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department shall be construed to be available for all other repairs, etc., and equipment of said building, grounds, and approaches, and the heating, hoisting, plumbing, and ventilating apparatus thereof."

Respectfully. FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

Mr. JONES. I offer an amendment to come in on page 116.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 116, after line 13, it is proposed to insert the following:

Medical relief of natives of Alaska: To enable the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion and under his direction, to provide for the medical and sanitary relief of the Eskimos, Aleuts, Indians, and other natives of Alaska; for erection, repair, rental, and equipment of hospital buildings; for books and surgical apparatus; for pay and necessary traveling expenses of physicians, nurses, and other employees, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under the above special heads, to be immediately available, $70,000.

Mr. WARREN. The committee has very carefully considered the matter. There is $200,000 in this bill to cover that and the accompanying expenses. There are very many good people who seek to take care of the Indians in Alaska, and all of us feel sympathy for them, but they are overdoing the matter, I think, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say that while there is $200,000 appropriated in this bill, it is for educational purposes in Alaska, and the money can not be used for the purposes indicated in the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. It is already being used for that, as the report shows.

Mr. JONES. The report of the Commissioner of Education says:

Under the comptroller's decision, to which reference has been made, the Bureau of Education can not, according to the language of the appropriation, erect hospitals in Alaska.

Mr. WARREN. When it comes to erecting buildings, that is possibly so.

Mr. JONES. This is largely for the erection and maintenance of buildings, and is estimated for by the Secretary in a letter under date of January 23, 1912. I desire to call attention to the report of the Commissioner of Education, in which he says:

I therefore earnestly recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate the sum of $70,000 in order to enable the Commissioner of Education, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to furnish medical and sanitary relief to the natives of Alaska and to establish sanitary conditions in the native villages.

The commissioner sets out in detail the purpose for which this money already in the bill is to be used.

Juneau Hospital, rental and maintenance, $3,000.

And then he gives the various other items.

The Commissioner of Education is very strongly in favor of this legislation and urges the necessity for it, and he quotes from the report of Dr. Foster, which I desire to read to the Senate:

Dr. Foster's report emphasizes the fact, which has been set forth for years past in the reports of the governor of Alaska, of the teachers of United States public schools in Alaska, of medical officers of the Government serving on revenue cutters in Alaskan waters, and of officers of the Army stationed in Alaska, that the checking of disease among the natives of Alaska is an urgent national duty.

Then he quotes from the report of the governor urging an appropriation of this character, and unless the Senate should adopt the amendment I have offered it seems to me we ought to expressly provide that of the $200,000, to which the chairman of the committee has referred, a certain portion shall be used for this purpose, because it seems to me that the stamping out of disease and holding in check disease among the natives of Alaska is really of far greater importance than education, important as that is.

I trust the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is true that the Commissioner of Education desires this appropriation. It is true also that the Commissioner of Education desired more than twice as much money as heretofore appropriated for his department here in Washington. It is true the amount has been asked for, as testified by Dr. Foster, but there must be a line somewhere between proper expenditures and extravagant expenditures, and I think we are traveling entirely too fast in some directions.

If we take our revenues, on the one hand, and then take the necessities, and sum them all up together and strike an average line, we can not justify these extravagant new appropriations.

I speak in the interest of economy, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I desire to say that I hope the amendment will prevail, because I fully investigated the conditions in Alaska as well as I was able. The condition of the people in that country is distressing, and some relief should be given. I hope very much the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, there may be some good reason why this item ought not to go on the pending bill, but the reason has not been advanced by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who says that a good many misguided people are overdoing the matter.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from Michigan is mistaken in saying that I used the word "misguided."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That a good many people, then, are overdoing the matter.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that we are traveling too fast. We can not travel too fast in the direction indicated by this amendment.

The truth is that we have neglected the people of Alaska long enough, and the testimony as to the rate of mortality in Alaska, if presented to the Senate, would be shocking. The truth is we ought to do more than we have ever done, and the amendment is in the right direction. It is meritorious; the money will not be wasted if applied in this manner.

I hope the Senate may, either upon this bill or at some other appropriate time before this session adjourns, do something to relieve those people from the dreadful conditions which surround them.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it was intimated by the chairman of the committee that some other provision had been made which would take care of this condition. I should like to know whether that is correct or not.

Mr. WARREN. On page 115, under the head of "Education in Alaska," they group this matter with the education. There is $200,000 appropriated for it, and the testimony before us gave the committee the particulars as to how it is used. It is a matter that was not overlooked by the committee. They took up these supplications from individuals and the report from the department, and the conclusion was that the $200,000 was sufficient to take care of the health and of the education as provided here. The $200,000 is only one of the appropriations for Alaska. There is $60,000 appropriated for the care of the insane, and other amounts for other purposes.

Personally I feel great interest in Alaska. I think all of us ought to feel a great interest in it. I believe we ought to be liberal. But because it is far away and because we have great sympathy with those people I think we ought to leave these matters to those who have them in charge as a matter of duty, rather than to assume the general attitude that we can not give Alaska too much. I feel as if we had appropriated sufficiently in the bill, and that it is not economy, but extravagance, to add anything to it.

Mr. WORKS. I wanted to be informed on that subject. If the present provision is not sufficient, I am thoroughly in sympathy with the amendment. At the same time, if those people have been provided for already, I think we ought not to indulge in extravagance.

Mr. JONES. The provision the chairman referred to—and there is nothing in this bill which authorizes the use of the money for the purposes proposed in this amendment—is as follows:

Education in Alaska: To enable the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion and under his direction, to provide for the education and support of the Eskimos, Aleuts, Indians, and other natives of Alaska.

Here is the further specification showing for what the $200,000 shall be used:

For erection, repair, and rental of school buildings; for textbooks and industrial apparatus; for pay and necessary traveling expenses of general agent, assistant agent, superintendents, teachers, physicians, and other employees, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under the above special heads, $200,000.

That is the provision with reference to the $200,000.

Mr. WORKS. If it be true, as stated by the chairman, that the $200,000 will be sufficient for the purpose, it seems to me the Senator from Washington might reach what he desires by including this particular matter within the appropriation of $200,000 instead of asking for an additional appropriation.

Mr. JONES. The department has sent down an estimate of $200,000 for the purposes I have specified in my amendment, indicating that the provision in the bill does not cover the purposes specified in the amendment. They evidently considered that $200,000 is necessary for the purposes indicated in the bill, and that to carry out the purposes of the amendment they need an additional amount.

Mr. WORKS. The committee seem to have determined that it will be sufficient for all purposes.

Mr. JONES. If it will be, I would not desire any more money. If the chairman of the committee is satisfied that the $200,000 will cover the purpose specified in the bill as well as those specified in the amendment, I shall be content if a provision is put into the bill to authorize the use of a part of the $200,000 for this purpose, as specified in the amendment. Then I will be willing to withdraw the amendment and offer another giving authority to use a part of the $200,000 for the purposes stated in the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. This $200,000, according to the testimony given before the committee by those who represent the matter, will not, of course, build all new hospitals. It will provide temporarily, but it will not go into the building of a lot of new hospitals.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator say that the repair of hospitals comes under that provision?

Mr. WARREN. So far as all other expenses are concerned, if we can believe the testimony, and if we can take the example of what they are doing now, it does provide for it. But the estimate the Senator from Washington speaks of was intended to greatly enlarge existing and to build new hospitals, which, of course, is another matter, and I think it ought to be considered in a different way.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say that in the statement submitted by the Bureau of Education they do not provide in an extravagant way for hospitals. Here it is:

Nushagak Hospital, rental and maintenance	3,000
Nulata Hospital, equipment and maintenance	3,000
Nome Hospital, equipment and maintenance	3,000

And so it goes. They are small hospitals, for the purpose of doing for the natives of Alaska what the Senator from Michigan has set out, and it does seem to me that the Senate should provide for the conditions there and take care of the natives.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY (when his name was called). Being paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HEYBURN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. As I do not see him in the Chamber I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Has that Senator voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that he has not voted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HEYBURN (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] with whom I am paired would vote "yea,' if present. So I desire to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer it to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER], and will vote. I vote "yea." I should like to have the announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to announce the pair between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I ask that the announcement stand for the day.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHILTON] on account of illness.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] having voted, I withdraw my vote.

The roll call resulted—yeas 28, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Ashurst	du Pont	McLean	Reed

The result having been announced—yeas 28, nays 28—the amendment was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that on the vote upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] there was a mistake in the recapitulation, and it appears that 28 Senators voted in the affirmative and 28 in the negative.

Mr. OVERMAN. I change my vote, then.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment is lost on that statement. That exactly tallies with the tally of the clerk of the committee here at my side.

Mr. JONES. I understand that the Senator from North Carolina desires to change his vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is too late for a vote to be changed.

Mr. LODGE. If it is not too late to correct the record, it is not too late to change a vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. Unless I get unanimous consent to change my vote, I will move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to. That motion is in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say unless unanimous consent is given me to change my vote I will move to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the amendment regarding relief for natives of Alaska the marked portion of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting the estimate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Dr. Foster's report emphasizes the fact which has been set forth for years past in the reports of the governor of Alaska, of the teachers of United States public schools in Alaska, of medical officers of the Government serving on revenue cutters in Alaskan waters, and of officers of the Army stationed in Alaska, that the checking of disease among the natives of Alaska is an urgent national duty. In his annual report for 1911, the governor of Alaska repeats the following statement, which appeared in his report for 1910:

"The existence of infectious diseases, alarming in their nature and wide prevalence among the native people, calls for vigorous action. The menace of infection extends to the white inhabitants, for there are Indians, Eskimo, or Aleut villages in the immediate neighborhood of nearly all the principal towns, and the natives mingle freely among the white in public places. The conditions have certainly not improved since 1908, when, in southeastern Alaska, a physical examination being made by one of the school physicians of 1,161 natives, 418, or 36 per cent, were found to be affected with tuberculosis, and 308, or 26 per cent, were found to be affected with venereal diseases. Among other diseases prevalent in southeastern Alaska, as well as in several other parts of the Territory, are trachoma and conjunctivitis; and in the Alaska Peninsula are several cases, which, after long and careful examination, are strongly suspected to be leprosy.

"There is no law which requires the natives to observe any of the ordinary rules of sanitation, and their unfortunate condition is often traceable directly to the filthy condition of their villages and the dwellings in which they live. Yet these people are generally respectful of the law, and a simple set of statutory requirements imposing a mild penalty for nonobservance would unquestionably cause a great improvement in sanitary conditions. The welfare of the white inhabitants, as well as that of the natives, demands such a law."

Realizing the absolute necessity for action, the Bureau of Education, under a favorable decision from the Comptroller of the Treasury, is using $25,200 of the appropriation for the education of natives of Alaska, 1912, in endeavoring to furnish medical relief to the natives of Alaska. It has established small hospitals for natives in rented buildings in Juneau and Nushagak; it employs five physicians and five nurses and has furnished medical supplies and manuals to the teachers of the United States public schools in order to enable them to treat minor ailments, and it is doing what it can to introduce sanitary methods of living into the native villages. Under the comptroller's decision, to which reference has been made, the Bureau of Education can not, according to the language of the appropriation, erect hospitals in Alaska.

The use of part of the appropriation for the education of the natives of Alaska for the suppression of disease is an emergency measure. The entire appropriation for education in Alaska is urgently needed in order to provide adequate educational facilities and for the industrial development of the native population, and it should not be diminished.

I therefore earnestly recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate the sum of $70,000 in order to enable the Commissioner of Education, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to furnish medical and sanitary relief to the natives of Alaska and to establish sanitary conditions in the native villages.

The following is an estimate of the expenditure of the appropriation desired:

Nushagak Hospital, rental and maintenance	3,000
Nulato Hospital, equipment and maintenance	3,000
Nome Hospital, equipment and maintenance	3,000
Kotzebue Hospital, equipment and maintenance	3,000
Physician, southeast district, salary	1,800
3 nurses, southeast district, salaries	3,600
Physician, southwest district, salary	1,800
2 nurses, southwest district, salaries	2,400
Physician, Kuskokwim district, salary	1,800
Physician, Yukon district, salary	1,800
Nurse, Yukon district, salary	1,200
Physician, Nome district, salary	1,800
Nurse, Nome district, salary	1,200
Physician, Kotzebue district, salary	1,800
Nurse, Kotzebue district, salary	1,200
Medicines	4,000
Traveling expenses of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service surgeon	1,500
Traveling expenses of physicians, nurses, and patients	2,100
Contract hospital, Seward or Valdez	2,000
Contract doctors	1,000
Sanitarium, erection and equipment	12,000
Sanitarium, maintenance and salaries of attendants	12,000
Total	70,000

Upon the request of the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Treasury has expressed his willingness to detail to Alaska an officer of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, who, in addition to his duties as representative of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, shall supervise all measures for the medical and surgical relief of the natives of Alaska, and where necessary in such work prescribe in the native villages measures to prevent the spread of disease, act as instructor to the teachers of the United States public schools in Alaska in all matters pertaining to the sanitary education of the natives, give instructions to teachers in first aid to the injured or sick, and act in a general advisory capacity to the superintendent of education of natives of Alaska in all matters pertaining to sanitation, hygiene, maintenance of hospitals, and other matters of like character.

If the appropriation requested above is granted, it is proposed that it shall be expended under the immediate supervision of said officer of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Very respectfully,

P. P. CLAXTON, Commissioner.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, after line 2, insert:

Albany, Oreg., post office: For additional cost of building, $10,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in reference to the amendment, I desire to submit that $65,000 was appropriated for the post-office building and the site. Ten thousand dollars of the amount was expended for the site and $55,000 was left for the erection of the building. After a building costing $55,000 had been determined upon, for the post office only, the Secretary of Agriculture asked that the building might be enlarged for the purpose of accommodating his force there. He has people in the Forestry Service there, and he asked to have it increased from the original size, making it a two-story building instead of one story.

The Supervising Architect advertised for bids, and the cost of construction ran a little above the amount of the appropriation. The bids have not been rejected, but it has been in statu quo in the hope that Congress might appropriate enough to erect a building large enough not only to accommodate the post-office authorities, but the authorities of the Agricultural Department.

I hope the Senate may be willing to admit this amendment to the bill, so that the building may be erected for both purposes.

In addition to that, since 1910 the town has grown quite considerably, so that even as a post-office proposition the building would be hardly large enough, and certainly it is not large enough for post-office purposes and for the purposes of the Forestry Service.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this represents a case that is similar to a good many. In fact, the whole line of public buildings has seemed to be subject to conditions of this kind. The system of constructing general public buildings for some years has been, on the Senate side, that bills were passed individually, providing for one building in each bill, and then sent to the House; and the House, when ready to take up the public-building bills, has placed them in a so-called omnibus bill. Finally they have gone through in the usual way, with the limit expressed in every case, just as the limit is expressed in the matter of river and harbor improvements. After that the appropriations have been carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill in such amounts from time to time as the department recommends, going up to and not beyond the limit.

Undoubtedly there will not be at this session an omnibus public-buildings bill. I am very sorry there was not such a bill sent over here to cover what I might call the shortages—that is to say, where the circumstances are as they are in the town of Albany, in Oregon. There are some cases that are even much more urgent than the case the Senator from Oregon has stated, and his is urgent. But the committee could not consider them because, in the first place, it is trenching not only upon the duties but upon the rights and privileges of another committee. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has jurisdiction as to the limit of cost of these buildings. We have no estimates for them. It is really changing the law. If the Senator will reflect he will see that the Committee on Appropriations would simply be swamped and overcome all the time by these additions for rivers and harbors and public buildings.

Therefore I shall have to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I shall withhold it for the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In this connection permit me to say that when the Senator states there has been no estimates, as a matter of fact before the appropriation was made an estimate as to the cost of the building was made by the officials from the Treasury Department. The trouble does not rest, Mr. President, with the citizens of the places who are asking that these appropriations be made, but the trouble lies with Congress. When an appropriation is made for a public building the estimates have been made by the Treasury Department, and Congress assumes to know more about it, usually, than either the officials of the Treasury Department or the people themselves of the town.

So it was in this case. Here was a case where the Treasury Department determined that it would cost $75,000 to put up a public building for the post office alone; $10,000 was expended for the site. Congress comes in and appropriates less than the amount estimated for by the Treasury Department and less than the amount demanded by the people of the city.

In the face of that, and after the Secretary of Agriculture comes in and asks that this building be utilized not only for the post-office authorities but in order to accommodate his department, it seems to be an unbusinesslike proposition at least to say that we will not only not give you enough to construct a building to accommodate the Agricultural officials, but we will not give you enough to complete the post-office building in accordance with the original design of the Treasury Department.

I think there is a difference between this case and many of the cases that are pending before the committee. It seems to me to be extremely bad business policy for the Government of the United States to now permit a building to go on and be completed, in the face of what the Supervising Architect says and in the face of what those say who know the situation as it exists, on the ground that it is absolutely too small to accommodate the post-office business alone, to say nothing of the service of the Agricultural Department, too. So Congress must be called upon in a very short time at least to tear down the building, as was done in one of the North Carolina cases, and erect one that will accommodate the Post Office Department and accommodate the Agricultural officials as well.

I do hope the Senate will permit the addition of this small amount, because, as I said a while ago, the bids have been received and are on file in the Treasury Department, and everything is awaiting the action of Congress, with reference to this small appropriation.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon what is the additional amount asked for.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Only $10,000.

Mr. WARREN. It is not a matter of $10,000 alone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In view of the statement made by the Senator, that it has been estimated for, the Chair will hear the chairman on that point.

Mr. WARREN. It has not been estimated for in the regular way. What the Senator means by an estimate is the original statement from the Treasury Department, which goes from the architect's office to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, stating about what certain buildings will cost, but not requesting appropriations. That has nothing to do with the regular annual estimates which come up to the Committee on Appropriations from the Secretary of the Treasury, which ask in terms for appropriations under the law and which are recognized under the Senate rules.

I sympathize most fully with the situation in regard to that building, but it is not as bad as a number of others. There are buildings all completed, except some of the inside finishings, that can not be completed and occupied until they have larger appropriations. I hope that early in the next session a bill will come, as one usually does, from the House covering these shortages or raising the limit upon certain public buildings needing to be thus provided for.

The Senator from Oregon has made a good case so far as the necessities of the building are concerned, but I have in mind more than a dozen, probably over 20, which have been before the committee to be considered; but they ought not to be considered in this bill. They can not be considered in this bill under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In view of the fact that an estimate has not been made in the regular way, the Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In connection with what I have had to say, I desire to submit a copy of a letter from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Albany, Oreg., and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALBANY COMMERCIAL CLUB,
Albany, Oreg., January 24, 1912.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have submitted your recent letter in relation to the Federal building, and also one received from Senator BOURNE, to our club, and after full discussion it was decided unanimously that it would be best to ask our delegation to work for an increase in the appropriation sufficient to erect the proposed building according to the enlarged plans adopted by the department.

Before the bill was introduced the Supervising Architect looked into the matter thoroughly and basing his action upon all information available and taking into consideration the needs of the Government service and allowing for a reasonable increase, he reported in favor of a one-story and basement building of 48,000 square feet area, to cost $85,000; but when the bill was passed the appropriation was cut to $65,000; then $10,000 of this was invested in the site, leaving $55,000 in the fund for the building. Before the plans were drawn the Secretary of Agriculture asked that another story be added for the use of the Forestry Service. This was granted, and when the plans were made they were for the same-sized area, but the building was to be a two-story and basement instead of one story. It was not to be wondered at that when the bids were opened the lowest was found to be $62,393, when the Supervising Architect had estimated that a one-story building covering the same area would cost $75,000—or, in other words, $85,000, less the price of the site.

We can not bring ourselves to believe that it would be good policy on the part of the Government to reduce the size of the building or to make it one story, as was originally contemplated, for the reason that the business of the post office has already increased over 70 per cent since the original appropriation was made; and from the way immigration is now pouring in here the increase during the next four years is sure to be still greater. Besides that, the business of the Forestry Service here is large now and constantly increasing, and it certainly would be economy on the part of the Government to have all its interests here centered in one building; and if one was erected now on the first plan it would be entirely inadequate to meet the demand. The additional appropriation needed need not be over $10,000 or $15,000, and if all the Government interests in this city could be well provided for on such a small outlay we think it would be good policy to get the appropriation if possible.

So we have arrived at the conclusion that the best course to follow would be to try for an additional appropriation, so as to cover the enlarged plans. Congressman HAWLEY informs us that he has already introduced House bill 17732, increasing the appropriation for the building in the sum of $10,000. We are inclined to believe that this may not be entirely sufficient, but this matter can be easily determined by consulting with the Supervising Architect.

Hoping that you, in connection with the others of our delegation in Congress, may be able to pull us out of this difficulty, I have the honor to be,

Yours, truly, C. H. STEWART,
Secretary Albany Commercial Club.

Mr. OVERMAN. On behalf of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], in his absence, I submit an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina, in behalf of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 114, after line 7, insert:

For the investigation and detection of violations of the law against the introduction of alcoholic liquors into the portion of the State of Oklahoma formerly known as the old Indian Territory, the same to be expended by the Attorney General in allowing such fees and compensation and expenses of marshals, deputies, and agents in collecting evidence and in defraying such other expenses as may be necessary for this purpose, $30,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I may say that the Supreme Court of the United States has lately decided that the Federal Government has jurisdiction of the liquor cases in the old Indian Territory, and in consequence of that decision the Attorney General has written a letter, which I wish to put in the RECORD, stating that he absolutely needs $30,000 in order to carry out the provisions of the law in regard to the sale of liquor in the Indian Territory.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, June 13, 1912.

Senator T. P. GORE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: You asked me to write you on the subject of the appropriation for the enforcement of the law against the introduction of liquor into Oklahoma under the Charley Webb case.

The essential thing is that the appropriation should be in such shape as will permit the use of deputy marshals for collecting evidence, as the circumstances of the peculiar situation make this particularly important, both from the point of view of effectiveness of the enforcement of the law and of economy. The Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled (May 3, 1911, and March 27, 1912) that the ordinary appropriations for salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals and their deputies can not be used to meet the expenses of those officers in collecting evidence.

Under the old special appropriation for the Department of Justice for the enforcement of the nonintercourse acts in reference to Indian country (32 Stat., 1139) there was a provision which covered such a use of deputy marshals, and on that we have modeled the following clause, which might be inserted after line 5, on page 114, of the present bill, as indicated:

"For the investigation and detection of violations of the law against introduction of alcoholic liquors into the portion of the State of Oklahoma, formerly known as the old Indian Territory, the same to be expended by the Attorney General in allowing such fees and compensation and expenses of marshals, deputies, and agents in collecting evidence and in defraying such other expenses as may be necessary for this purpose, $30,000."

This $30,000 for salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals and their deputies is the estimate made by the conference of the United States marshal for the eastern district of Oklahoma with the United States judge and the United States attorney. They also estimated the other expenses, as follows:

Jurors	$20,000
Witnesses	40,000
Prisoners	15,000
Bailiffs	1,000

None of these items would seem to require a special appropriation, but could most conveniently be handled under the large general appropriations made for these purposes at pages 119 to 121 of the present bill and by the usual deficiency appropriations on these points.

I inclose a copy of the bill on which, at page 114, I have inserted the clause above proposed, and at page 117 I have inserted another clause which might accomplish the same purpose, but which, I suppose, would be a less practicable method of doing it.

Very respectfully,
WINFRED T. DENISON,
Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. WARREN. If the amendment is carried, I suggest that the Secretary insert it at the proper place. It should be placed under "Miscellaneous objects, Department of the Interior," on page 115, after line 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be inserted at that point. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 130, after line 7, insert:

For indexing and annotating the judicial code, $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the work to be under the direction of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the following amendment to go at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following:

The accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby directed to reopen and adjust the claim of the State of Massachusetts for money expended in protecting the harbors and strengthening the fortifications on the coast, heretofore adjusted under the act of July 7, 1884. And in making such adjustment, the act of July 27, 1861, as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, shall be applied in the same manner and with the same effect as though said money had been expended for the equipment of troops.

Mr. WARREN. I shall have to make a point of order against that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to offer this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 167, after line 14, insert the following:

Bureau of the Census: For collection of statistics concerning the quantity of leaf tobacco of all forms in the United States and its possessions and making report of same, as authorized by the act entitled "An act to collect and publish additional statistics of tobacco," approved April 30, 1912, $25,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is to carry out existing law. So I shall offer no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to offer also the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky offers an amendment, which will be read:

The SECRETARY. On page 120, after line 10, insert:

Semicentennial exposition: For expenses semicentennial exposition for celebration of semicentennial anniversary of the act of emancipation, as provided by "An act providing for the celebration of the semicentennial anniversary of the act of emancipation, and for other purposes," approved April 3, 1912, $250,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is a broad subject. It can go to the Senate for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BACON. I did not know that it was going to a vote. I really do not know what it is. I wish the Senator would explain it to us.

Mr. BRADLEY. The Senator from Georgia will remember that some time ago we had up and discussed at length the question of an appropriation for a semicentennial celebration of the act of emancipation, and that act passed unanimously. The object of this amendment is to appropriate the money for the purpose of providing for that exposition.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BRADLEY. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Did not that act itself make an appropriation?

Mr. BRADLEY. It did not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had rather see that $250,000 spent for the purpose of taking care of the sick and the poor somewhere in the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 175, after the word "office" in line 11, it is proposed to insert:

Pressmen to be paid at the rate of 55 cents per hour.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the amendment just offered provides for the increase of the salary of the pressmen from 50 cents per hour to 55 cents per hour. There are about 100 pressmen in the Government Printing Office at the present time, and the adoption of the amendment would mean an increase annually of $12,500. The printing bill that passed the Senate about a month and a half ago provided for this increase, and I shall offer no objection to the increase. I will say, however, that the printing bill has not yet passed the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will venture to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that it would be better to make the amendment a proviso to the paragraph, so as to read "Provided," and so forth.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to the form, if it is deemed desirable that it be put in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be better to make it a proviso.

Mr. REED. The Senate has already passed the printing bill, but that bill has not yet become a law and there is some question about the fate of the bill. This is simply to carry the measure through in this bill. It is a very moderate increase. There has been an increase in this instance, I think, but once in 17 or 18 years.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Does that amendment come in after the provision for leaves of absence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is where it comes in.

Mr. WARREN. I would suggest that the Senator from Missouri offer the amendment as an independent paragraph on page 181, after line 23. It seems to me it would be better to make it an independent paragraph.

Mr. REED. Then I ask to strike out the word "Provided" and to insert "Hereafter," and to insert the amendment at the place suggested by the Senator from Wyoming. That will be satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be inserted at that point. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 174, line 14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 174, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the word "one" and to insert the word "two," so as to read:

Two at $2,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if that is to provide for Mr. Harris, an employee in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is to enable the Public Printer to increase his salary from $1,800 to $2,000.

Mr. SMOOT. What I want to know is whether we should not make the change some other way than by merely making a direct appropriation of $2,000 for one man? As I understand, the amendment is to enable the Public Printer to pay the increase of $200.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. Then there will remain an appropriation for an $1,800 clerk.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; there can be one less clerk of the latter class.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just what I wanted to call the Senator's attention to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Just a moment. I have examined the matter, and find the amendment is estimated for as the Senator from Iowa offers it. I am not certain, but I can find nothing in the estimate to indicate that a clerk should be dropped at some other place in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. My understanding is that this is to pay Mr. Harris in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is to pay some person.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; whether it is he or someone else, and it is an increase from $1,800 to $2,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to the amendment, but as it seems to be a promotion merely, I believe we ought to provide for one clerk less of the $1,800 class.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is what Mr. Donnelly said upon the matter in the hearing before the House committee:

The CHAIRMAN. Now you ask for certain increases over last year. The first is, instead of one clerk at $2,000 you ask for two clerks at $2,000.

Mr. DONNELLY. It is requested that one clerk be promoted from $1,800 to $2,000. This clerk is in charge of the property records of the office. It is proposed to increase his salary from $1,800 to $2,000, which will increase the number of clerks at $2,000 from one to two.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand that, in view of the acceptance of that amendment, another amendment should be made, in line 14, to strike out the word "ten" and insert "nine."

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that that would naturally follow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 174, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the word "ten" and to insert "nine."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. On page 57, line 8, after the figures "$50,000," I move to amend the Senate committee amendment by adding:

Provided, That this money shall be paid out of the Philippine treasury.

Mr. President, I only desire to say that I am opposed to the Senate committee amendment, as I do not believe the Government ought to enter upon the building of a railroad in the Philippine Islands; but if it is done, I think, as it is to be a permanent improvement, it ought to be paid for out of the Philippine treasury, and not out of the National Treasury. I call attention to the message of the President sent to the other House on the 19th instant, in which he says that the Philippines are self-sustaining. We ought therefore to provide against the taking of this $200,000 out of the National Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator kindly withhold his amendment until the bill reaches the Senate, when it will be in order to amend?

Mr. CULBERSON. I want to amend the bill while it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. I think I am entitled to do so.

Mr. WARREN. Under the rule, it having been passed upon, the amendment to the amendment would not be in order, but, of course, it makes no difference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the vote agreeing to the amendment on page 57, from line 4 to line 8, will be reconsidered, and the amendment will be considered as open to amendment. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment, submitted by the Senator from Texas, which will now be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 57, line 8, after the sum "$50,000," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That this money shall be paid out of the Philippine treasury.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want that amendment to the amendment to carry, and I believe the Senator from Texas, on reflection, will hardly think it ought to carry. As he is frank enough to say he is against the whole proposition, of course that amendment to the amendment would perhaps accomplish the purpose of making the amendment useless. The railroad proposed to be built by the United States is exactly the same in principle as the railroad system at Fort Leavenworth and other large Army posts. Its usefulness is almost entirely for the Government itself, and it simply happens that it involves not any more miles of railroad than there are, perhaps, in other places, but is in one line, a narrow-gauge railroad for the use of the Government. The matter will be settled, I want to say to the Senator, eventually, without doubt, by its going to the Philippines and their paying for it; but at present there is no way by which it could be handled as the Senator proposes. So I hope the amendment may not carry.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have something I want to say on this question, but I prefer to wait until the bill goes into the Senate, when the whole matter will be open. I have some other matters to urge upon the consideration of the Senate as to why this railroad should not be built, but I will not detain the Senate now to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the bill passes from the Senate as in Committee of the Whole I desire to give notice that I wish to reserve the right to object to the amendment adopted with reference to the construction of the railroad in the Philippines. I also want to call attention to another fact. If I am correct in my opinion, the Senator from Wyoming possibly was misled as to the facts in stating that the appropriation which was asked for by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] was to carry out existing law. I do not think the law has been passed. The bill has passed the Senate, but it has not passed the House.

Mr. WARREN. To which law does the Senator from Georgia refer?

Mr. BACON. The law with reference to that exposition.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is mistaken. I made no such reference. The language the Senator is quoting was directed to the amendment providing for the collection of statistics concerning leaf tobacco, which is provided for in the law. As to the other subject, I said it was a large matter, and I did not like to take the responsibility, and I asked that it might go to the Senate for a vote.

Mr. BACON. Immediately thereafter, as it was about to be put, I got up and, having reference to that, asked that we might have information about it. Certainly if it related to the other matter, we did not correctly understand it on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. WARREN. Did the Senator direct his appeal to me for information? If so, I did not observe it.

Mr. BACON. I did have the Senator in my mind, although I did not name him; but when I made the request and the Senator from Kentucky responded, of course I thought that response was to the inquiry I made.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will reflect, he will remember that there were two amendments, and it was to the first one that I directed my remarks.

Mr. BACON. I know nothing about that. The Senator stated it was a very grave matter and he would submit it to the Senate, and immediately, as I think the RECORD will show, the Chair proceeded to put the question. Before the result was announced I said I would like to have some information about it. I had in mind that alone, and when the Senator said that it was to carry out existing law I sent for the document, and I find that it has only passed the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I did not say that it was to carry out existing law in that case, and the RECORD will so show.

Mr. BACON. I do not dispute the Senator's statement at all, but I am only showing how absolutely and thoroughly the matter was misunderstood.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understood that the $250,000 which was appropriated for an exposition or for a celebration was based on the supposition that it was to carry out existing law. Do I understand now that there is no law for it?

Mr. BACON. None.

Mr. BORAH. And the House has not passed the bill?

Mr. BACON. It has not.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I did not understand the Senator from Wyoming to say that it was existing law, but the impression on this side was that such a law had been passed. From some source or other we got that impression.

Mr. WARREN. I said nothing whatever of that kind; but I think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] remarked that the bill had passed the Senate, which, I believe, is true. I may be mistaken, but I know that I said nothing about it.

Mr. BACON. It is a simple matter to reserve that amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. REED. If it is necessary to give any notice, I desire to say that I want to reserve the right to vote in the Senate on the amendment on page 105, providing for the purchase of a motor boat for Alaska.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to reserve the amendment, beginning after line 16, on page 2, relating to the Tariff Board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments to be offered the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments not reserved will, without objection, be concurred in in the Senate. The Senator from Texas reserves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On pages 2 and 3, the amendment of the committee relating to the Tariff Board.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. REED. I raise the question of no quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that the calling of the roll will disclose that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri raises the question of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga
Bacon	Fall	Massey	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas demands the yeas and nays on the first reserved amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is the committee amendment on pages 2 and 3, which, as amended, reads as follows:

To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenues, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production, as are authorized by said act or any existing law, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes; and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, $225,000. Such officers shall report annually to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, on which the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. If he were present and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and therefore withhold my vote. If allowed to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. CRANE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CRANE] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HEYBURN (when his name was called). I would inquire if the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I find myself obliged to withdraw my vote owing to the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I am paired.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next reserved amendment will be stated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the amendment that I called attention to, upon which we are about to vote, is the one to purchase a motor boat to be used in Alaska. It was discussed at great length here one day, and we adjourned just before the vote was taken.

I do not think we ought to buy this boat unless we are going to equip it with proper armament to shoot ducks, because I think that is the purpose for which the boat is intended to be used.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon the question of concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 105, beginning in line 7, as amended, the amendment reads:

Purchase of motor boat, Alaska: To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to purchase a motor boat for use in the District of Alaska in the investigation of unlawful cutting of timber from the public lands, the inspection of timber cut under permit, and the examination of alleged illegal entries, $5,000.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief explanation relating to the necessity for this amendment.

People who are familiar with the map of Alaska know there is a narrow strip along the Pacific coast, southeast of the one hundred and forty-first meridian, which consists in the main of an archipelago. There is a strip along the mainland with a great many inlets and bays. The boundary line is just back of it on the summit. Most of the timber in southeastern Alaska—in fact, in Alaska—is confined to those islands. There is but one steamship route that runs from Seattle by way of Victoria along the inner passage up to Skagway at the head of the new canal. That boat only stops along a few of the principal places on the main route and does not touch most of these islands.

Now, a boat of this kind is as necessary there as a horse and buggy or an automobile would be on the dry land. The only way of getting to those islands is in some kind of water craft, some kind of a boat, and the regular steamboat plying there on the regular route does not touch these islands. The only way they can be reached is by some kind of a boat, and I think, as a matter of economy to the Government, the officers need and should have such a boat to go from one island to another in that archipelago.

The conditions there are entirely distinct and different from those existing in any other part of the country. The distance by the inner passage from Seattle to Skagway is about a thousand miles, and over half of that distance is between the mouth of the Portland Canal and the front of Cape St. Elias, where the one hundred and forty-first meridian of longitude constitutes the boundary line between that country and the Yukon territory. In all that region in that archipelago the only way of getting from island to island and from point to point is by some kind of water craft.

Now, if the Government has its own boats it will manifestly be a saving of expenses, as compared with hiring other boats, if such can be procured. I doubt whether any other boats can be secured there, except boats run by private parties, and perhaps they will be sailboats and in some instances, where the distance is short, rowboats.

I think there is an absolute necessity for this boat, growing out of the conditions in Alaska, and for that reason I am in favor of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the question of concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the last roll call, that I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. WATSON (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). I again announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHILTON], on account of personal illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. CRANE's name was called). I desire to announce the general pair of my colleague [Mr. CRANE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I will also at the same time announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

I will let this announcement stand for the day on all votes upon the bill.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I withhold my vote on account of the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I have a general pair. I would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" if I were at liberty to vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], and withhold my vote.

Mr. BRADLEY. I should like to state that being paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bourne	Fletcher	Nelson	Smoot
Bristow	Gallinger	Oliver	Stephenson
Burton	Gronna	Page	Sutherland

So the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have here a communication which I should like to have read, and the last clause in small type I propose as an amendment to come in on page 171, after line 7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator kindly withhold it until reserved amendments are acted upon?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I thought we were through with those.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further reserved amendments?

Mr. BACON. I do not know which amendment is first in order, but there are two I am interested in. One is in regard to the building of the railroad in the Philippine Islands, on page 57. I want to suggest something about it, to see whether I am correct in it or not. The Senator from Wyoming, if I recollect correctly, stated that that was the post at which it was necessary to transport 8,000 tons of freight a year. That was the statement of the Senator, if I recollect it aright.

Mr. WARREN. I said from seven to eight thousand tons. The estimate of the Quartermaster's Department was that there would be at least 7,500 tons.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, since that occurred the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] sought from the War Department information as to the number of men at this post, and the information received was that at the two posts, which it seems are on that line, Camp Overton and Camp Keithley——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will perhaps remember——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator remembers that I said the other day when this amendment was under discussion that there were two posts there when I visited the place called then MacVicker and Keithley, Keithley being on one side of the lake and MacVicker on the other, and that this road supplied both, because it would reach one, and from the one there is water transportation to the other.

Mr. BACON. I am not taking issue with that in any manner. I presume those are the same posts named now Keithley and Overton given differently; given by the name of the camps.

The statement of the War Department is that at one camp there are two companies of the Eighth Cavalry, I and K, and at the other camp there are two companies of the Eighth Infantry, E and H, and also a battalion of Philippine Scouts of three companies. That would make altogether seven companies. I suppose that there are less than 100 men in each company. I have no idea that there are that many, but taking that as the estimate, which I presume is at least 50 per cent over the actual fact, for I do not suppose the companies have anything like 100 men——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator has noticed the latest information from the War Department, it intends those companies to be composed of 150 men. I do not believe they are that large now, but that is the plan which is now proposed to be carried out in the Philippines.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator refer to the scouts or to the Army?

Mr. WARREN. I am referring to the Army. As to the scouts, I think it is undetermined, but they will probably follow the same line, it being, as it is thought, an economy in the use of the officers of the Army, putting more men under such officers.

Mr. BACON. If there were anything like 150 men to the company, we would have the maximum strength of the Army. I think it is a conceded fact that to-day we have only 60 or 70 per cent of the maximum strength of the Army as authorized by law. There are possibly only about 60 per cent, if I recollect aright, of the full strength of the Army. Am I correct in that?

Mr. WARREN. The strength of the Army authorized by law is 100,000, and these enlargements of the companies are said to be within the limit of 100,000. Replying to the direct question put by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee to the Secretary of War, he replied that those increases would be within the limit of 100,000.

Mr. BACON. That refers to the future; and whenever there are 150 men to the company there will be the full maximum strength allowed by law.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator mean that there are not 150 men now in some of the companies of troops in some lines of service? If so, he is certainly mistaken.

Mr. BACON. I do not mean to say at this time; I mean to say exactly what I intended to say—that if that was the strength of the companies generally it would bring the Army fully up to the maximum.

I suppose we need not say anything about those matters of detail, because, even allowing a very liberal margin, if I have made any correct figures there was some wide error on the part of the department; and I think it important not simply as to this particular proposition but as a general thing that we may have some little suggestion as to whether or not there is any great wastefulness and extravagance, not only in this instance but in the service generally, because if I am correct in my figures and the same system exists everywhere there is a tremendous amount of waste and extravagance. If I am incorrect of course I would be more than glad to have my error pointed out.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to assume—and I hope I may have the attention of the Senator from Wyoming, as he is the captain general on this subject.

Mr. WARREN. I am listening.

Mr. BACON. I am going to assume that the companies have 100 men each. Then to the extent that I may be in error about that my calculation will be erroneous. I understand, however, that the suggestion made by the Senator from Wyoming as to 150 men to the company applies to what is intended, not to what has already existed, and the 8,000 tons applies to the past, not to the present or the future, if I understand it. If I understood the Senator correctly he stated that the transportation required to meet the necessities there was about 7,000 or 8,000 tons a year, so that even if there are 150 men contemplated for a company in the future there is no contention, I presume, that that has been the case heretofore.

Now, Mr. President, how 8,000 tons of freight can be required for a post of 700 men is past my mathematical power to figure out. It is said there are only two companies of Cavalry. The little calculation I made here is upon the basis of their being all Cavalry and accounting for all their horses; no I am mistaken about that. I am counting 200 horses for the Cavalry and 100 extra for the quartermaster's department and everything else. So there are 300 horses there.

Now, how much in the way of freight do those 300 horses require? A liberal estimate is 20 pounds a day of all kinds of food for a horse—the forage, and the corn or the oats, as the case may be. Twenty pounds is an outside estimate of the amount required per horse.

This may look like a very small matter when we are going through these calculations, but when it is proposed to build a railroad because the requirements are such that the ordinary means of transportation are not adequate, then it is important to see whether there is a wide difference between the amount of transportation which it is said is necessary and that which we can figure out as being necessary.

If there are 300 horses, 200 Cavalry horses, and 100 extra horses for other purposes, 3 tons a day is a large allowance for them, and it is an allowance of more than is necessary. That would make in the course of a year, at 3 tons a day, 1,095 tons in a year.

Now, when you come to the men, there are two kinds of freight, or possibly three. There may be others that I do not think of, and, of course, I am ready to be corrected in this statement. Two pounds a day for food is a liberal estimate for men, and with 700 men at 2 pound a day in the course of 365 days there would be 256 tons. Then allowing 20 pounds each for every man for his clothing and things of that kind outside of his food, the transportation necessary for him, which is certainly a liberal estimate, and evidently an extravagant estimate in that climate, that would be 7 tons a year, and the aggregate amount is 1,358 tons.

Now, for ammunition I do not know how much ought to be allowed, but I would say 2 tons, because not much ammunition is used. The country is settled down and there is no fighting going on. They have a full supply on hand, of course, but I would suppose that 2 tons each of ammunition a year for 700 men would be a most liberal estimate, and we would have in the aggregate less than 1,400 tons a year.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, there are more than 700 men at that post.

Mr. BACON. Very well, I will come to that, if the Senator pleases. The Senator will pardon me if I go on with the estimates now, because I said to the extent I was in error as to the number of men, of course the calculation would be in error. I am perfectly willing, before I get through, to double the number of men, and then you would have a vast margin, and double the tonnage, and you would have a large margin; but I think I am within the estimate. Of course I am ready to be corrected if I am not.

I say that that amounts to less than 1,400 tons a year in place of 8,000 tons. If there have been 8,000 tons, or 7,000 tons if you please, carried, there is a vast margin to be accounted for. If that exists at this little post, it is a very pertinent question whether or not it is in accordance with the general system and whether this immense unnecessary expenditure is saddled upon the public.

If I am correct in my calculation so far, that would make less than 4 tons a day to transport over this route on which it is proposed to build a railroad. It is only 22 miles.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And an easy grade.

Mr. BACON. The Senator says it is an easy grade. The grade is about 3 per cent, if I recollect correctly, and if it is nothing but a trail now, it can be easily cut into a road. We all know that these roads are constructed by the soldiers; but even if it had to be paid for by the Government it is very different from building a railroad. Suppose there is a wagon road constructed by the soldiers, which is entirely feasible and practicable, and in accordance with the usual customs and methods of the Army four 2-horse wagons a day, carrying only 1 ton each, would do this business, and if it is an extraordinarily good road three would do it easily. Yet it is proposed to build a railroad for this purpose.

Mr. President, if there was no railroad built at all, and there was nothing but a mountain trail, this freight could be carried on burros at an absolutely insignificant cost. A burro will carry easily upon such a trail certainly a hundred pounds, and if it is a good one it will carry 200. I have seen them on a good road carrying 300 pounds. I have frequently seen a burro loaded with three sacks of corn; no doubt the Senator from New Mexico has frequently seen the same thing; and that is over 300 pounds. And burros cost $5 apiece. But if they did not have burros they could take mules. A mule would easily carry 300 pounds over any ordinary trail. How many mules would it take? They are driven simply by the soldiers backwards and forwards.

Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate with this matter, but suppose we double it, suppose we double it. The Senator says that there are more than that many soldiers there. The information I get was given to me by the Senator from North Carolina, obtained by him personally from the War Department. But suppose we double the number and say there are fourteen hundred there. Then seven or eight wagons would do the entire business with the soldiers as teamsters, and at little or no expense to the Government.

I do not wish to detain the Senate, Mr. President, on this subject. I wanted to present those figures. If I am wrong, I hope some Senator will point it out. Am I in error as to the transportation needed, and the forage for horses, as to the weight, as to the amount consumed? Am I wrong as to the amount needed to transport in order to sustain the soldiers either as to their food or as to their clothing? Am I wrong as to ammunition, where there is no artillery, as to the weight of that? If I am, let some Senator show that I am wrong. If I am not wrong, Mr. President, I submit it would be inexcusable and indefensible for us to proceed to the construction of this road.

Therefore I ask that we may have another vote on the question.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, allowing that the Senator is right and that everybody connected with the Army must be wrong, I can see as the Senator goes along that his statement covers only a moiety of the supplies that have to be furnished. His idea of 2 pounds of food net for a man may be correct. The idea of the number of pounds of transportation is quite different.

Another thing, they have to have shelter. There is material to go there for shelter. There have to be arms and ammunition. We have the testimony of the different heads of bureaus and Secretaries for some years.

The Quartermaster General of the Army is a seasoned and experienced man, acknowledged to be one of the best Quartermaster Generals the Army has ever had. He has gone through this subject carefully. We have the Secretary of War, and of course his information is gleaned and garnered and winnowed out from all the information that comes to him from the heads of bureaus. He says:

The original cost of the transportation required to supply the posts on Lake Lanao is conservatively estimated at $200,000—

Not $175,000 or $150,000, but $200,000—and this amount does not include the cost of transportation required for field use of the garrisons. The annual cost of maintaining this transportation is $175,000. There has already been expended in construction and maintenance of the road from Camp Overton to Camp Keithley a total sum exceeding $300,000, not including the work done by troops during the early stages of construction, and it has cost to maintain the road from $24,000 to $36,000 a year. This expense for maintenance must continue year after year.

He says, on the cost of this Overton-Keithley road, which is through a country of torrential storms:

The total cost of this road to date added to the value of the transportation, equipment, and its maintenance for the last seven years reaches the enormous total of $1,750,000, or an average of about $250,000 per year.

Mr. BACON. What is that statement? I did not catch it.

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary of War says the total cost of the wagon road and its maintenance and the transportation has cost $1,750,000 to date, or an average of about $250,000 a year. He says, further:

Such expenditures show a lack of business foresight.

There is more of it, in further explanation, but I will not now stop to read it.

Mr. BACON. I should say that such expenditures show something else besides a lack of business foresight.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me to finish what I was going to say—an academic calculation here of the amount of freight surely can not be as correct as the actual facts as recorded in the amount of freight taken over this road during the time since these posts were established. It is not a matter of appropriating money, but it is a matter to be left to those who are in favor of actual economy.

Mr. BACON. I think that this is a matter of sufficient importance, as throwing light upon the nature of the expenditures in the War Department, for the items and the details of these expenditures to be brought to the attention of Congress. If it be true that there has been any such expenditures as that, I think we ought to have the items of it, because if we have had expenditures of that kind in this instance there have been expenditures of the same kind in numerous other instances. If we have had this vast expenditure on account of that little road, we ought to know how it was built and what the items are, so that we can see whether or not this money was correctly spent. If it be true that there were 8,000 tons or 7,000 tons of freight carried to that camp or to those two camps, we ought to have the items. If it be true that there have been $150,000 or $160,000 spent in a year for the purpose of transporting the freight needed for this simple garrison of soldiers, we ought to have the items of that cost of transportation. I hope that it may be had now. I hope it in order that the War Department may be shown to be correct, if it is correct. It ought not to be allowed to stand as it is.

Mr. President, how can we hope for anything like economy in the expenditures if this is a sample of it, if it be true, so far as I can figure it out, that it far exceeds what would be a legitimate expense?

I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming, who is not only in charge of the appropriation bill but who was for a long time at the head of the Military Committee of the Senate. Possibly there is no Senator within my term of service who is in a better position to judge of matters as to the military affairs than he. I should like to know what is the most practicable way for us to get a detailed statement as to this particular expenditure, because that is what I want. I want to know, if that road has cost over a million dollars, something about the way in which that cost was expended.

Mr. WARREN. I think if the Senator would prefer the slightest request to the Secretary of War or to the Quartermaster General—probably it ought to go to the Secretary of War—he would be furnished with it.

Mr. BACON. Very well. Then we can get it in that way, and get the items as to the amount of freight carried and what it consisted of and the cost, not simply the aggregate cost, but the bills. That is what I want. How was this money expended? How were the 8,000 tons of freight, in the first place, needed for this small encampment, and how was $150,000 or $160,000 expended in the transportation of 8,000 tons of freight? Those are the things we want to know. I do not doubt the fact that we expended it. I am not for a moment suggesting that the charge is not correct on the books of the Quartermaster's Department, but what I want to know is how can it be so.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong the discussion, but at times there have been, and probably there will be again, a great many more troops there. There were more when I was there. As the Senator knows, it is almost in the center of the Mindanao country—the Moro country. The number of troops varies according to the circumstances. As the Senator knows, we have had some rather severe disturbances in the Moro country.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator uses 8,000 tons as a unit; he must remember that that is the average; but the latest information is that for the following year it will be at least 7,500 tons.

Mr. BACON. Well, I think we ought to have that information; I think those are matters about which Congress ought to be informed. We have the responsibility of the appropriation of money, and I think we ought to be informed when such an enormous amount of supplies, 8,000 tons, are said to be needed for one or two small encampments of soldiers as to what those supplies are; and when $20 a ton is stated to be the cost of their transportation for 22 miles over a practicable road that has cost over a million dollars, we ought to know in what way that money was expended. I hope that those who have it in charge, the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, will take the steps to secure this information.

Mr. WARREN. The facts were all before the committee which considered these matters.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator if there is anything which shows of what those 8,000 tons consisted?

Mr. WARREN. The papers submitted from time to time covered that question.

Mr. BACON. I want to know what the items were.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator expect me from memory to give him every pound of salt or every pound of starch?

Mr. BACON. I do not; but the Senator said the papers showed the items, and I desire to know about them.

Mr. WARREN. The papers give the amount——

Mr. BACON. In the aggregate.

Mr. WARREN. They give it in the aggregate, of course.

Mr. BACON. But that does not answer the question. I want some way of finding out why 8,000 tons of freight were needed for two small encampments, and then I want to know why it is that, over a road costing over a million dollars, it has cost $20 a ton to transport that freight 22 miles.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will not misconstrue what I said. The million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars included the building of the road and the transportation over it since it was built.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I said. The average, according to the testimony of the Secretary of War, has been $250,000 a year; that is, the average for building the road, keeping it in repair, and to carry this material.

Mr. BACON. Of course, I would not misrepresent the Senator. I certainly misunderstood him, but now that the road is built, I want to understand why it costs $20 a mile to transport freight 22 miles. I want the information at some time—not now; I am not asking the Senator to give it now—but I think it is due to Congress that it should be given to it. How is it that 8,000 tons of freight were needed for these two little encampments, and why is it that over a costly road it has taken $20 a ton to transport freight 22 miles—a dollar a mile per ton?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HEYBURN (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that my pair, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANK-

HEAD], is not present in the Chamber, and I am informed he has not voted. I will therefore be compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I withhold my vote on account of my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who does not appear to be in the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON. I will transfer my general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to transfer my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 25, as follows:

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to present a committee amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I merely wanted to be sure that I had reserved an objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] with reference to an appropriation of $250,000 for a centennial celebration.

Mr. WARREN. It is understood that that is reserved.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wanted to be sure that it was reserved.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, a very late act calls for attention in connection with this appropriation bill. I refer to the act approved on the 22d of this month calling for an appropriation of $57,250 for use of the Census Bureau in relation to cotton investigations. I send the amendment to the desk and ask the Secretary to insert it immediately after the $25,000 tobacco amendment, which has heretofore been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment agreed to relating to investigations of quantities of leaf tobacco, it is proposed to insert the following:

For securing information for census reports of cotton production, and periodical reports of stocks of baled cotton in the United States, and of the domestic and foreign consumption of cotton, and to enable the Bureau of the Census to carry out the provisions of "An act authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton," approved July 22, 1912, $57,250.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order against the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] that there is no legislation that justifies it, no estimate that justifies it, and that it is an increase of appropriations which can not be made from the floor by amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 180, after line 10, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted the following amendment:

SEMICENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

For expenses semicentennial exposition: For celebration of semicentennial anniversary of the act of emancipation, as provided by "An act providing for the celebration of the semicentennial anniversary of the act of emancipation, and for other purposes," approved April 3, 1912, $250,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The mistake is this: The Senate has passed a bill providing an appropriation for the celebration and that bill is pending in the other House. The bill passed by the Senate carries its own appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the chairman of the committee whether or not an estimate was made for this appropriation?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the committee has no regular estimate for this amount.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WARREN. There are no further reservations of amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment in the Senate, the amendments will be ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, before the reading of the bill I ask unanimous consent to call up a joint resolution and have it passed. I do not think there will be any objection to it. It will not take a minute.

Mr. DU PONT. I will say to the Senator from Arizona that I shall have no objection to granting his request a little later on when the bill for which I have asked consideration is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. DU PONT. I now yield to the Senator from Arizona.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 103.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 103) directing the Secretary of State to investigate claims of American citizens growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico, to determine the amounts due, if any, and to press them for payment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make, or cause to be made under his direction, a full and thorough investigation of each and all claims of American citizens and of persons domiciled in the United States which may be called to his attention by claimants or their attorneys for damages for injuries to their persons or property, received by them or by those of whom claimants may be the legal representatives, within the boundaries of the United States, by means of gunshot wounds or otherwise inflicted by Mexican Federal or insurgent troops during the late insurrection in Mexico in the year 1911.

For the purpose of such investigation the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a commission of three officers of the Army, one of whom shall be an inspector general. Such commission shall have authority to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, and to take evidence on oath relating to any such claim and to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers in any such proceeding by application to the district court of the United States for the district within which any session of the commission is held, which court is hereby empowered and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary for that purpose, and said commission shall have all the powers conferred by law upon inspectors general of the United States Army in the performance of their duties. Such commission shall report to Congress, through the Secretary of War, as soon as practicable, its findings of fact upon each and all the claims presented to it and its conclusion as to the justice and equity thereof and as to the proper amount of compensation or indemnity thereupon.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to investigate the claims of American citizens for damages suffered within American territory and growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico."

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware? The Chair hears none.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the head of "Permanent establishment," on page 2, line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That section 1315 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, fixing the membership of the Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy, is hereby amended by changing the clause "one from the District of Columbia" so as to read "two from the District of Columbia": Provided further, That hereafter any candidate designated as principal or alternate for appointment as cadet may present himself at any time for physical examination at West Point, N. Y., or other prescribed places, as may be designated by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That hereafter graduates of the Military Academy shall receive mileage as authorized by law for officers of the Army from West Point, N. Y., to the station which they first join for duty: And provided further, That hereafter whenever all vacancies at the Military Academy shall not have been filled as a result of the regular annual entrance examinations, the remaining vacancies shall be filled by admission from the list of alternates from the respective States in which the vacancies occur, selected in their order of merit established at such entrance examinations. The admissions thus made shall be credited to the United States at large and shall not interfere with or affect in any manner whatsoever any appointment authorized by existing law: Provided, That whenever, by the operation of this or any other law, the Corps of Cadets exceeds its authorized maximum strength as now provided by law, the admission of alternates as prescribed in this act shall cease until such time as the Corps of Cadets may be reduced below its present authorized strength.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 23, after the word "dollars," to insert: "Provided, That hereafter two assistant professors shall be authorized in the department of English and history, one for English and one for history," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 10 assistant professors (captains), in addition to pay as first lieutenants, $4,000: Provided, That hereafter 2 assistant professors shall be authorized in the department of English and history, one for English and one for history.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 11, after the word "captain," to insert "in addition to his regular pay," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one adjutant, who shall not be above the rank of captain, in addition to his regular pay, $600.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what is the present pay of the adjutant? I see it is here proposed to be increased by $600.

Mr. DU PONT. The pay the adjutant receives depends entirely upon his rank as an officer of the Army.

Mr. CULBERSON. The adjutant is usually a captain, is he not?

Mr. DU PONT. He is usually a captain in these days, though formerly it was not so. This is to make up his pay to $3,000—$50 a month additional.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 8, after line 11, to insert:

Hereafter there shall be maintained at the United States Military Academy an engineer detachment, which shall consist of 1 first sergeant, 1 quartermaster sergeant, 6 sergeants, 8 corporals, 2 cooks, 2 musicians, 40 first-class privates, and 40 second-class privates.

For pay of such engineer detachment, $24,000; additional pay for length of service, $6,408: Provided, That the enlisted men of said detachment shall receive the same pay and allowances as are now or may be hereafter authorized for corresponding grades in the battalions of engineers: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to authorize an increase in the total number of enlisted men of the Army now authorized by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 1, before the word "typewriter," to strike out "L. C. Smith No. 10," so as to make the clause read:

For one typewriter and cabinet, $120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 18, after the words "remain so until," to strike out "expended" and insert "completion," so as to make the clause read:

For completion of the East Academic Building, including finished grading, approaches, etc., in accordance with the plans and specifications approved by the Secretary of War, to be immediately available and to remain so until completion, $95,117.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 1, after the word "Hereafter," to strike out "the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy is authorized to avail himself of leaves" and insert "the Secretary of War may grant the superintendent of the academy leave," and in line 4, after the words "period that," to strike out "he" and insert "the superintendent," so as to make the clause read:

Hereafter the Secretary of War may grant the superintendent of the academy leave of absence without deduction from pay or allowances for the same period that the superintendent may grant leave of absence to other officers of the academy under the provisions of section 1330 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, after line 6, to strike out:

No pay shall be withheld from Lieut. Col. J. M. Carson, jr., Deputy Quartermaster General, United States Army, because of the payment by him in May, 1909, when major and quartermaster, United States Army, for eight horses or polo ponies purchased pursuant to instructions from the Secretary of War for use in the instruction of cadets at the United States Military Academy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to be inserted at the close of the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That any officer of the United States Army now holding the position of permanent professor at the United States Military Academy who on July 1, 1914, should have served not less than 33 years in the Army, one-third of which service shall have been as professor and instructor at the Military Academy, shall on that date have the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel in the Army.

Mr. DU PONT. I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO EXCISE BILL.

Mr. BORAH. I submit an amendment which I desire to offer to the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships. I ask that it be printed, lie on the table, and also be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BORAH to the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships, viz: Insert the following:

That from and after the 1st day of January, 1913, there shall be assessed, levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income received in the preceding calendar year by every citizen of the United States, whether residing at home or abroad, and by every person residing in the United States, though not a citizen thereof, a tax of 2 per cent on the amount so received over and above $5,000; and a like tax shall be assessed, levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income from all property owned and of every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing elsewhere.

Such gains, profits, and income shall include the interest received upon notes, bonds, and all other forms of indebtedness, except the obligations of the United States, States, counties, towns, districts, and municipalities; all amounts received as salary or compensation for services, except such as may have been received by State, county, town, district, or municipal officers; all profits realized within the year from the sale of real estate purchased within two years previous to the close of the year for which the income is estimated; the amount of all premiums on bonds, notes, or coupons; the amount received from the sale of merchandise, live stock, sugar, cotton, wool, butter, cheese, pork, beef, mutton, or other meats, hay, grain, vegetables, or other products; money and the value of all property acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent; and all other gains, profits, and income derived from any other kind of property, or from rents, dividends, interest, or from any profession, trade, business, employment, or vocation, carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever: Provided, however, That it shall be proper to deduct from such gains, profits, and income all expenses actually incurred in conducting any business, occupation, or profession, including the amounts actually expended in the purchase or production of merchandise, live stock, and products of every kind; all interest due or paid within the year on existing indebtedness, and all national, State, county, town, district, and municipal taxes, not including those assessed against local benefits; all losses actually sustained during the year, incurred in trade or arising from fires, storms, or shipwreck, and not compensated for by insurance or otherwise; all debts ascertained to be worthless, and all losses within the year on sales of real estate purchased within two years previous to the year for which profits, gains, or income is estimated, but no deduction shall be made for any amount paid out for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments, made to increase the value of any property or estate; the amount received from any corporation, company, or association as dividends upon the stock of such corporation, company, or association if the tax of 3 per cent has been paid upon its net profits by said corporation, company, or association as required by this act: Provided further, That only one deduction of $5,000 shall be made from the aggregate income of all the members of any family composed of one or both parents and one or more minor children, or husband and wife, but guardians shall be allowed to make a deduction in favor of each and every ward, except where two or more wards are comprised in one family and have joint property interests, when the aggregate deduction in their favor shall not exceed $5,000.

That there shall be assessed, levied, and collected for the calendar year 1912, and for each calendar year thereafter, a duty of 2 per cent on the net gains, profits, and income over and above $5,000 of all corporations, companies, or associations organized for pecuniary profit under the laws of the United States or under the laws of any State or Territory or doing business for pecuniary profit in the United States, no matter where or how created or organized, but not including copartnerships. The aforesaid net gains, profits, or income of any such corporation, company, or association shall include its entire gains, profits, and income save and except the amounts paid out during the year for maintenance, operation, and a reasonable allowance for depreciation; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe and establish such system of bookkeeping and reports as may be necessary to insure uniformity in this respect: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall apply to corporations, companies, or associations organized and conducted solely for charitable, religious, or educational purposes, including fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, or associations operating upon the lodge system and providing for the payment of life, sick, accident, and other benefits to the members of such societies, orders, or associations and dependents of such members; nor to the stocks, shares, funds, or securities held by any fiduciary or trustee for charitable, religious, or educational purposes; nor to building and loan associations or companies which make loans only to their shareholders; nor to such savings banks, savings institutions, or societies as shall, first, have no stockholders or members except depositors and no capital except deposits; secondly, shall not receive deposits to an aggregate amount, in any one year, of more than $1,000 from the same depositor; thirdly, shall not allow an accumulation or total of deposits, by any one depositor, exceeding $10,000; fourthly, shall actually divide and distribute to its depositors, ratably to deposits, all the earnings over the necessary and proper expenses of such bank, institution, or society, except such as shall be applied to surplus; fifthly, shall not possess, in any form, a surplus fund exceeding 10 per cent of its aggregate deposits; nor to such savings banks, savings institutions, or societies composed of members who do not participate in the profits thereof and which pay interest or dividends only to their depositors; nor to that part of the business of any savings bank, institution, or other similar association having a capital stock, that is conducted on the mutual plan solely for the benefit of its depositors on such plan, and which shall keep its accounts of its business conducted on such mutual plan separate and apart from its other accounts; nor to any insurance company or association which conducts all its business solely upon the mutual plan and only for the benefit of its policy holders or members, and having no capital stock and no stock or share holders, and holding all its property in trust and in reserve for its policy holders or members; nor to that part of the business of any insurance company having a capital stock and stock and share holders, which is conducted on the mutual plan, separate from its stock plan of insurance, and solely for the benefit of the policy holders and members insured on said mutual plan, and holding all the property belonging to and derived from said mutual part of its business in trust and reserve for the benefit of its policy holders and members insured on said mutual plan; nor to any part of the business of any insurance company having a capital stock and stock and stockholders except as to those gains and profits and income legally distributable to such capital stock and among such stock and stockholders. All State, county, municipal, and town taxes paid by corporations, companies, or associations shall be included in the operating and business expenses of such corporations, companies, or associations: Provided further, That any stockholder of any corporation, company, or association the income of which is taxable and taxed under the provisions hereof, whose total income from all sources does not render him liable to the duty herein provided for, may, at any time within six months after the corporation or association of which he is a stockholder has paid the duty herein required, file a written application with the collector of the district in which he resides, in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, showing that his total income for the year under consideration, computed as hereinbefore set forth, did not exceed $5,000; such application shall be under oath and accompanied by such other proof as the rules and regulations may require. If the application and proof are satisfactory to the collector, and are approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and it further appears that the gains or profits of any share or shares of capital stock owned by any such stockholder in any such corporation have been included in the income upon which the corporation has paid a duty, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the applicant the proportionate part which his share or shares contributed to such duty; the intent being to exempt any person whose total income, computed as herein provided, is not more than $5,000 from the payment directly or indirectly of an income duty; and the Secretary of the Treasury is expressly authorized to establish such rules and regulations, and to provide such forms, as will enable such persons to present their claims and receive their reimbursement with least difficulty and delay consistent with the due administration of the law.

It shall be the duty of all persons of lawful age having an income of more than $5,000 for the preceding year, computed on the basis herein prescribed, to make and render a list or return, on or before the second Monday in March of every year, in such form and manner as may be directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the collector or a deputy collector of the district in which they reside, of the amount of their gains, profits, and income as aforesaid; and all guardians and trustees, executors, administrators, agents, receivers, and all persons or corporations acting in any fiduciary capacity, shall make and render a list or return, as aforesaid, to the collector or a deputy collector of the district in which such person or corporation acting in a fiduciary capacity resides or does business, of the amount of gains, profits, and income of any minor or person for whom they act, but persons having less than $5,000 income are not required to make such report; and the collector or deputy collector shall require every list or return to be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party rendering it, and may increase the amount of any list or return if he has reason to believe that the same is understated; and in case any such person having a taxable income shall neglect or refuse to make and render such list or return, or shall render a willfully false or fraudulent list or return, it shall be the duty of the collector or deputy collector to make such list according to the best information he can obtain, by the examination of such person or any other evidence, and to add 50 per cent as a penalty to the amount of the tax due on such list in all cases of willful neglect or refusal to make and render a list or return; and in all cases of a willfully false or fraudulent list or return having been rendered to add 100 per cent as a penalty to the amount of tax ascertained to be due, the tax and the additions thereto as a penalty to be assessed and collected in the manner provided for in other cases of willful neglect or refusal to render a list or return, or of rendering a false or fraudulent return: Provided, That any person or corporation, in his, her, or its own behalf or as such fiduciary, shall be permitted to declare, under oath or affirmation, the form and manner of which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, that he, she, or his or her or its ward or beneficiary was not possessed of an income of $5,000 liable to be assessed according to the provisions of this act; or may declare that he, she, or it, or his, her, or its ward or beneficiary has been assessed and has paid an income tax elsewhere in the same year, under authority of the United States, upon all his, her, or its gains, profits, and income, and upon all the gains, profits, and income for which he, she, or it is liable as such fiduciary, as prescribed by law; and if the collector or deputy collector shall be satisfied of the truth of the declaration, such person or corporation shall thereupon be exempt from income tax in the said district for that year; or if the list or return of any person or corporation, company, or association shall have been increased by the collector or deputy collector, such person or corporation, company, or association may be permitted to prove the amount of gains, profits, and income liable to be assessed; but such proof shall not be considered as conclusive of the facts, and no deductions claimed in such cases shall be made or allowed until approved by the collector or deputy collector. Any person or company, corporation, or association dissatisfied with the decision of the deputy collector in such cases may appeal to the collector of the district, and his decision thereon, unless reversed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be final. If dissatisfied with the decision of the collector, such person or corporation, company, or association may submit the case, with all the papers, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for his decision, and may furnish the testimony of witnesses to prove any relevant facts, having served notice to that effect upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as herein prescribed. Such notice shall state the time and place at which, and the officer before whom, the testimony will be taken; the name, age, residence, and business of the proposed witness, with the questions to be propounded to the witness, or a brief statement of the substance of the testimony he is expected to give: Provided, That the Government may at the same time and place take testimony upon like notice to rebut the testimony of the witnesses examined by the person taxed. The notice shall be delivered or mailed to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue 15 days previous to the day fixed for taking the testimony, in which to give, should he so desire, instructions as to the cross-examination of the proposed witness. Whenever practicable, the affidavit or deposition shall be taken before a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, in which case reasonable notice shall be given to the collector or deputy collector of the time fixed for taking the deposition or affidavit: Provided further, That no penalty shall be assessed upon any person or corporation, company, or association for such neglect or refusal or for making or rendering a willfully false or fraudulent return, except after reasonable notice of the time and place of hearing, to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, so as to give the person charged an opportunity to be heard.

Every corporation, company, or association doing business for profit in the United States shall make and render to the collector of the collection district in which it has its principal office, or if it has no principal office then in which it is transacting business, on or before the second Monday in March in every year, a full return, verified by oath or affirmation, in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, of all the following matters for the whole calendar year next preceding the date of such return:

First. The gross profits of such corporation, company, or association, from all kinds of business of every name and nature.

Second. The expenses of such corporation, company, or association, exclusive of interest, annuities, and dividends.

Third. The amount paid on account of interest, annuities, and dividends, stated separately.

Fourth. The amount paid in salaries, with a list of all officers, employees, and persons receiving more than $5,000 per annum, stating the name and address of such officers, employees, and persons.

Fifth. The net profits of such corporation, company, or association, without allowance for interest, annuities, or dividends.

And any corporation, company, or association failing to comply with the requirements of this section shall forfeit as a penalty the sum of $1,000 and 2 per cent on the amount of taxes due, for each month until the same is paid, the payment of said penalty to be enforced as provided in other cases of neglect and refusal to make return of taxes under the internal-revenue laws.

The taxes herein provided for shall be assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and collected and paid upon the gains, profits, and income for the year ending the 31st of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said tax; shall be due and payable on or before the 1st day of July in each year; and to any sum or sums annually due and unpaid after the 1st day of July as aforesaid, and for 10 days after notice and demand thereof by the collector, there shall be added the sum of 5 per cent on the amount of taxes unpaid, and interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month upon said tax from the time the same becomes due, as a penalty, except from the estates of deceased, insane, or insolvent persons.

Any nonresident may receive the benefit of the exemptions hereinbefore provided for by filing with the deputy collector of any district a true list of all his property and sources of income in the United States and complying with the provisions of section — of this act as if a resident. In computing income he shall include all income from every source, but unless he be a citizen of the United States he shall only pay on that part of the income which is derived from any source in the United States. In case such nonresident fails to file such statement, the collector of each district shall collect the tax on the income derived from property situated in his district subject to income tax, making no allowance for exemptions, and all property belonging to such nonresident shall be liable to distraint for tax: Provided, That nonresident corporations shall be subject to the same laws as to tax as resident corporations, and the collection of the tax shall be made in the same manner as provided for collection of taxes against nonresident persons.

It shall be the duty of every collector of internal revenue, to whom any payment of any taxes is made under the provisions of this act, to give to the person making such payment a full written or printed receipt, expressing the amount paid and the particular account for which such payment was made; and whenever such payment is made such collector shall, if required, give a separate receipt for each tax paid by any debtor, on account of payments made to or to be made by him to separate creditors in such form that such debtor can conveniently produce the same separately to his several creditors in satisfaction of their respective demands to the amounts specified in such receipts; and such receipts shall be sufficient evidence in favor of such debtor to justify him in withholding the amount therein expressed from his next payment to his creditor; but such creditor may, upon giving to his debtor a full written receipt, acknowledging the payment to him of whatever sum may be actually paid, and accepting the amount of tax paid as aforesaid (specifying the same) as a further satisfaction of the debt to that amount, require the surrender to him of such collector's receipt.

Sections 3167, 3172, 3173, and 3176 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended are hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3167. It shall be unlawful for any collector, deputy collector, agent, clerk, or other officer or employee of the United States to divulge or to make known in any manner whatever not provided by law to any person the operations, style of work or apparatus of any manufacturer or producer visited by him in the discharge of his official duties, or the amount or source of income, profits, losses, expenditures, or any particular thereof, set forth or disclosed in any income return by any person or corporation, or to permit any income return or copy thereof or any book containing any abstract or particulars thereof, to be seen or examined by any person except as provided by law; and it shall be unlawful for any person to print or publish in any manner whatever not provided by law, any income return or any part thereof or the amount or source of income, profits, losses, or expenditures appearing in any income return; and any offense against the foregoing provision shall be a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court; and if the offender be an officer or employee of the United States he shall be dismissed from office and be incapable thereafter of holding any office under the Government.

"SEC. 3172. Every collector shall, from time to time, cause his deputies to proceed through every part of his district and inquire after and concerning all persons therein who are liable to pay any internal-revenue tax, and all persons owning or having the care and management of any objects liable to pay any tax, and to make a list of such persons and enumerate said objects.

"SEC. 3173. It shall be the duty of any person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation made liable to any duty, special tax, or other tax imposed by law, when not otherwise provided for, in case of a special tax, on or before the 31st day of July in each year, in case of income tax on or before the first Monday of March in each year, and in other cases before the day on which the taxes accrue, to make a list or return, verified by oath or affirmation, to the collector or a deputy collector of the district where located, of the articles or objects, including the amount of annual income, charged with a duty or tax, the quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise made or sold, and charged with a tax, the several rates and aggregate amount, according to the forms and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for which such person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation is liable: Provided, That if any person liable to pay any duty or tax, or owning, possessing, or having the care or management of property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles, or objects liable to pay any duty, tax, or license, shall fail to make and exhibit a list or return required by law, but shall consent to disclose the particulars of any and all the property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles, and objects liable to pay any duty or tax, or any business or occupation liable to pay any tax as aforesaid, then, and in that case, it shall be the duty of the collector or deputy collector to make such list or return, which, being distinctly read, consented to, and signed and verified by oath or affirmation by the person so owning, possessing, or having the care and management as aforesaid, may be received as the list of such person: Provided further, That in case no annual list or return has been rendered by such person to the collector or deputy collector as required by law, and the person shall be absent from his or her residence or place of business at the time the collector or a deputy collector shall call for the annual list or return, it shall be the duty of such collector or deputy collector to leave at such place of residence or business, with some one of suitable age and discretion, if such be present, otherwise to deposit in the nearest post office a note or memorandum addressed to such person, requiring him or her to render to such collector or deputy collector the list or return required by law, within 10 days from the date of such note or memorandum, verified by oath or affirmation. And if any person on being notified or required as aforesaid shall refuse or neglect to render such list or return within the time required as aforesaid or whenever any person who is required to deliver a monthly or other return of objects subject to tax fails to do so at the time required, or delivers any return which, in the opinion of the collector, is false or fraudulent, or contains any undervaluation or understatement, it shall be lawful for the collector to summon such person, or any other person having possession, custody, or care of books of account containing entries relating to the business of such person, or any other person he may deem proper, to appear before him and produce such books, at a time and place named in the summons, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories, under oath, respecting any objects liable to tax or the returns thereof. The collector may summon any person residing or found within the State in which his district lies; and when the person intended to be summoned does not reside and can not be found within such State, he may enter any collection district where such person may be found, and there make the examination herein authorized. And to this end he may there exercise all the authority which he might lawfully exercise in the district for which he was commissioned.

"SEC. 3176. When any person, corporation, company, or association refuses or neglects to render any return or list required by law, or renders a false or fraudulent return or list, the collector or any deputy collector shall make, according to the best information which he can obtain, including that derived from the evidence elicited by the examination of the collector, and on his own view and information, such list or return, according to the form prescribed, of the income, property, and objects liable to tax owned or possessed or under the care or management of such person, or corporation, company, or association; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall assess all taxes not paid by stamps, including the amount, if any, due for special tax, income or other tax, and in case of any return of a false or fraudulent list or valuation intentionally he shall add 100 per cent to such tax; and in case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence, to make a list or return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add 50 per cent to such tax. In case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid the collector may allow such further time for making and delivering such list or return as he may deem necessary, not exceeding 30 days. The amount so added to the tax shall be collected at the same time and in the same manner as the tax unless the neglect or falsity is discovered after the tax has been paid, in which case the amount so added shall be collected in the same manner as the tax; and the list or return so made and subscribed by such collector or deputy collector shall be held prima facie good and sufficient for all legal purposes."

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho if the proposed amendment which he has just offered relates to the corporation tax?

Mr. BORAH. It relates to the excise bill, which is an extension of the corporation tax.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. Is it designed to repeal the exemption of holding companies from the payment of taxes under the old corporation-tax law?

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I desire to offer an amendment to the same bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table. I also desire to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. CLAPP to the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships, viz:

The act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by striking out the words "exclusive of amounts received by it as dividends upon stock of other corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations, or insurance companies, subject to the tax hereby imposed" where they occur in section 38 of said act; also by striking out of said section 38 of said act the words "(fifth) all amounts received by it within the year as dividends upon stock of other corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations, or insurance companies, subject to the tax hereby imposed" wherever they occur in the second paragraph of said section 38 of said act; also by striking out of said section 38 of said act the words "also the amount received by such corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations, or insurance companies within the year by way of dividends upon stock of other corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations, or insurance companies, subject to the tax imposed by this section" where they occur in the third paragraph of said section 38 of said act.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY FOR ALASKA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to call from the calendar the bill (H. R. 38) to create a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska, to confer legislative power thereon, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which has been reported from the Committee on Territories with amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is the Alaska civil-government bill. I do not know that it requires any special elucidation on my part. It is appropriate, has been long delayed, and should pass the Senate promptly.

Mr. CULLOM. It should be read, at any rate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLAPP. While it is true that the bill has been before the Senate for some time, I think I ought to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he have the entire bill read. It will probably save a great deal of discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well. I yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, and ask that the bill be read in its entirety.

Mr. CULLOM. Read it in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan demands the reading of the bill in full. The Secretary will read the bill in full.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask that the amendments of the committee may be read by the Secretary, and adopted.

Mr. BORAH. The request of the Senator from Michigan is simply that the Senate concur in the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. That does not include, as I understand, any material matter in section 9. No amendments to that section are, I understand, printed in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That section will be reached in order, I will say to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. After the committee amendments are disposed of, then there will be an opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that the amendments be taken up in their order and acted upon separately.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am just asking that that course be taken, and will gladly meet the wishes of my honored friend from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks that the bill be considered for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered. Without objection, that course will be taken. The Secretary will report the first committee amendment.

The first amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 16, to strike out "game and fish" and insert "game, fish, and fur-seal," so as to read:

Provided, That the authority herein granted to the legislature to alter, amend, modify, and repeal laws in force in Alaska shall not extend to the customs, internal-revenue, postal, or other general laws of the United States or to the game, fish, and fur-seal laws of the United States applicable to Alaska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 17, after the word "Alaska," to insert:

Or to the laws of the United States providing for taxes on business and trade, or to the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1905, and the several acts amendatory thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 3, line 5, after the article "a," to insert "legislative assembly, to be hereafter called the"; in line 7, after the article "a," to strike out "senate and a"; in the same line, after "representatives," to strike out "The senate shall consist of eight members, two from each of the four judicial divisions into which Alaska is now divided by act of Congress, each of whom shall have at the time of his election the qualifications of an elector in Alaska, and shall have been a resident and an inhabitant in the division from which he is elected for at least two years prior to the date of his election. The term of office of each member of the senate shall be four years: Provided, That immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election they shall, by lot or drawing, be divided in each division into two classes; the seats of the members of the first class shall be vacated at the end of two years and the seats of the members of the second class shall be vacated at the end of four years, so that one member of the senate shall, after the first election, be elected biennially at the regular election from each division. The house of representatives shall consist" and insert "composed"; on page 4, line 2, after the word "years," to strike out "and each person shall possess the same qualifications as prescribed for members of the senate. The" and insert "each of whom shall have at the time of his election the qualifications of an elector in Alaska and shall have been an actual resident and inhabitant in the division from which he is elected for at least two years prior to the time of his election, and the four"; in line 8, after the word "persons," to strike out "having" and insert "receiving"; in line 9, after the word "votes," to strike out "in each of said senate districts for members of the senate shall be declared elected, and the persons having the highest number of legal votes for the house of representatives" and insert "for such office in each of said judicial divisions"; in line 13, after the word "be," to strike out "declared" and insert "deemed"; in the same line, after the word "elected," to strike out "Provided, That in case two or more persons voted for have an equal number of votes, and in"; in line 15, before the words "a vacancy," insert "In case of"; in the same line, after "vacancy," to strike out "otherwise occurs in either branch of the legislature"; in line 16, after "order," to strike out "a new" and insert "an"; in line 17, after "election," to insert "to fill such vacancy, giving due and proper notice thereof"; in line 18, after "member," to strike out "of the legislative assembly"; in line 20, after "while," to strike out "the legislative assembly is"; and in line 23, after "route," to strike out "and no more," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. The legislature: That the legislative power and authority of said Territory shall be vested in a legislative assembly, to be hereafter called the legislature, which shall consist of a house of representatives, composed of 16 members, 4 from each of the 4 judicial divisions into which Alaska is now divided by act of Congress. The term of office of each representative shall be for two years, each of whom shall have at the time of his election the qualifications of an elector in Alaska and shall have been an actual resident and inhabitant in the division from which he is elected for at least two years prior to the time of his election, and the 4 persons receiving the highest number of legal votes for such office in each of said judicial divisions shall be deemed elected. In case of a vacancy the governor shall order an election to fill such vacancy, giving due and proper notice thereof. That each member shall be paid by the United States the sum of $15 per day for each day's attendance while in session, and mileage, in addition, at the rate of 15 cents per mile for each mile from his home to the capital and return by the nearest traveled route.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill for some information. I understand the bill provides for a legislature composed of 16 members.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have struck out the House provision, which provided for two chambers, and provided a single chamber, which shall be denominated the legislature.

Mr. BORAH. Simply one body?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One chamber.

Mr. BORAH. How are the members of that body to be elected?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By direct vote of the people of Alaska. They are to be elected in the same manner as the Delegate in Congress.

Mr. BORAH. The legislature is to be composed of 16 members, 4 from each judicial division?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And they are to be elected by the people?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are.

Mr. BORAH. I heard a statement read about $15 a day. Is that to be the pay of members of the legislature?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. The regular session is limited, however, to 60 days and special sessions to 15 days.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Michigan whether he does not think it would be better to substitute for the per diem an allowance for the session? As I understand it, this legislature is limited in its regular session to 60 days and in its special session to 15 days. If, then, the legislature is in session throughout the entire 60 days the total compensation of each legislator would be about $900, and for each special session of 15 days the total compensation would be $225.

My observation with reference to the legislature is that where a per diem is given the legislature is likely to sit throughout the entire period, and often unnecessarily. It is desirable that ample compensation should be given to the legislators, for in a Territory such as Alaska the expenses of the election are very large. In many of the States a single legislator will spend in the expenses of the election the entire sum that he receives during the session.

It seems to me that they ought to have the stimulus and the advantage of the knowledge that if the public business can be transacted in a less period than 60 days it should be done, and we should encourage them in that direction without reducing their pay. Obviously, it would be unfair to put these men to the expense of an election and then expect them to remain in session only 15 or 20 days, with a limited per diem which would not reimburse them the expenses of their election.

It strikes me it would be a great deal better to fix the compensation of the regular session at $900, in the hope that they would get through it in half of the 60 days, and to make the compensation at the special session $225. I know that change has been made beneficially in a number of States of late years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The committee, after giving the matter very careful thought, determined to limit the length of the regular session to 60 days and an extraordinary session to 15 days. We felt that a per diem for the time actually spent would be better than a gross sum, and that it would insure a more prompt attendance of members than if they should receive an annual salary regardless of attendance. At least this course can be tried, and if it does not work out satisfactorily it can be changed. What we are attempting to do is largely experimental and may call for further review, but for the present we feel that this plan can be tried with perfect propriety.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I lived in a Territory a great many years, and the sessions of the legislature were limited to 60 days; and the sessions of the legislature of the State which succeeded the Territory were limited to 60 days. I think a limitation of 60 days upon a Territorial legislature gives a sufficient protection against any undue prolongation of a session. The fact is that 60 days is a short time for a State legislature or a Territorial legislature, particularly in Alaska, with the immense geographical extent and the variety of situations in it, to transact the necessary business.

A great many of its members come into the legislature for the first time, and not being familiar with legislative practice or procedure or rules, they are necessarily novices, and it takes half the 60 days for them to learn to do committee work and to transact the business. I think, however, there is sufficient protection here in the limitation of 15 days for a special session and of 60 days for a regular session.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I believe, of course, in the limitation as to time prescribed in the bill. The only question is as to whether a lump sum should be given or whether it should be a per diem compensation. I believe in a lump-sum payment. I believe you would encourage a better class of men to go to the legislature by making them feel assured that by going there and acting promptly in a businesslike way and dispatching the business they can get away in less than 60 days, and at the same time receive a compensation that will cover the expenses of their election and justify them in running for the legislature.

I know this change has been made in a number of legislatures; I can not specify them just now; but it has been made in the New York Legislature, it has been made in the Virginia Legislature, and in others. In my own State of Nevada some of us have considered the advisability of urging the substitution of a lump sum for a per diem in the hope that it would encourage men of capacity and ability to go to the legislature with the assurance that the time would not be unnecessarily taken up in a prolonged session.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the financial consideration has evidently weight in regard to the length of the session. Might not the payment of a lump sum lead to an early adjournment of the regular session and a failure to pass necessary laws so that a special session would be necessary? In that way they would get the compensation of the regular session and also compensation for the special session.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think it would lead to an unnecessarily early adjournment of the legislature. On the contrary, I believe it would result in the expedition of the public business, and, above all, it would encourage men to go to the legislature who would be willing to go there for 15 or 30 days with the assumption that during that time they could dispatch all the necessary business, but who would be unwilling to go there for a period of 60 days with the consciousness that they would be held by their associates in order to gain the necessary per diem.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator yield further? Does the Senator think we should encourage too hasty a consideration of legislation by offering such inducements to cut the term down so short? It seems to me 60 days is a very reasonable limitation upon a legislative body——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. JONES (continuing). To pass upon matters that will come up in Alaska. So with the compensation fixed at $15 a day I am rather inclined to think it would secure better service than with the lump sum mentioned by the Senator, without encouraging haste in disposing of the legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not disposed to press this suggestion in the form of an amendment against the views of the committee. I simply made the suggestion. I am confident that the legislature ought to be encouraged to adjourn early instead of prolonging its sessions, provided it does the work; but I believe you would get a very much better class of men by giving them ample compensation for a term which they could make short or long as they chose than by absolutely compelling them to sit 60 days in order to secure the compensation which the law entitles them to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the election in November and the meeting of the legislature the first Monday of March do not seem to me to promise well for Alaska. The northern district of Alaska is so situated that it must rely upon the navigable streams for transportation and access to the capital. The Yukon River closes up in September. The election would be held about two months after the navigable streams of Alaska were closed with ice. People in the northern district of Alaska as a rule—that is, people who are able—aim to leave that country for the winter not later than September. So they would not conveniently be present in that district at the time the election was held. If an election was held in November it would necessarily follow that they must remain there until after the election, and then those elected as members of the legislature must reach the capital at Juneau prior to March. That is a closed season, between November and March, to a great deal of Alaska. There are only certain sections of it that are open during that time.

It does not seem to me that the selection of the date of the election is wise nor is the date selected for the meeting of the legislature practicable at all. You are going to provide that the members elected must reach the capital and enter upon the performance of their duty and perform it within 60 days. Now, that would be from March to June.

The ice on the Yukon very frequently does not break up until after June, and the question arises in my mind as to whether you would have any legislature at all unless they selected only members living in such places as would be exempt from the restrictions of navigation and travel. It would seem to me that the election should be in the open season and the meeting of the legislature as well in the open season.

I think the election in Alaska should be after the breaking up of the ice in the rivers and the opening of the trails for travel. There are no roads to speak of. There are no railroads. It is very doubtful whether there could be assembled a legislature in March that would be representative of Alaska.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, the time for the election and the time for the assembling of the legislature was given very careful thought by the committee, and we reached the conclusion that the season of the year named in the bill would be the most propitious both for the election and for the assembling of the legislature, because the roads and trails will all be open, and Juneau, the capital, is accessible from land and sea at that time. Over $2,000,000 have been spent on roads in Alaska.

Mr. HEYBURN. Accessible by water?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; Juneau is an open port all the year and can be reached both by water and by land. This was one of the reasons for leaving the capital there. Some of us would have been glad to change it to Fairbanks or Seward, both more central but not as accessible.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would have to be shown some changed conditions that would justify me in believing that Juneau would be available by any road or trail at that season of the year. There is a certain class of hardy citizens who can take a dog team and traverse any part of the country, but they are not the men who go to legislatures. They are the hardy frontiersmen, who would hardly be selected for the performance of those duties. The class of men equipped to perform the duties of a legislator would not undertake to make a trip from places like Circle City and some of those points in northern Alaska either in November or in March.

I have been there in November. I know something of the conditions that exist in Alaska in November. I have been there also during the summer months. I feel confident that during July, August, and early September the citizens of Alaska could assemble for the purpose of holding an election or for the purpose of attending a legislature, but I do not believe that during the month of November it would be safe to rely upon conditions of travel that would enable them to assemble.

The worst of all is March, the time fixed for the meeting of the legislature. Alaska is as completely a closed country in March to-day as it ever was. There have been no means of transportation developed in Alaska that make it more convenient to travel to-day in March than 50 years ago. I remember slight exceptions, which are not of sufficient importance to be considered in determining this matter.

I have no doubt at all that the committee has to the extent of its ability and in the exercise of its best judgment arrived at the conclusions expressed in this bill, but why it should have selected the closed season for both the election and the meeting of the legislature is beyond my comprehension. If there were no other season, if there were no open season, then it might be that they would be compelled to accept conditions, however burdensome or difficult they might be.

I merely call attention to this more for the purpose of calling for an expression of opinion from those having the bill in charge, that we may have some information as to the mental processes that led to the conclusions expressed in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the committee, of course, was guided somewhat by the suggestion of the Territorial Delegate from Alaska upon that point. He said:

> The country is all frozen solid by the last of November, and you can travel everywhere. The trails are good, and in March the days are long, and you can travel from Nome, the most distant point, up the river by way of Fairbanks or cross over by Seward, and get to the capital very quickly.
> Senator BRISTOW asked:
> How are conditions in May when the time comes to adjourn?
> The Delegate replied:
> The rivers are open by the 10th of May, and you can travel by boat. There is no difficulty in traveling at that time.

With that information before us we felt that there was nothing to do but acquiesce in the period named. But this whole matter is always under the control of Congress. Congress may change the date or even the capital at any time. There is not a provision in this proposed law that Congress may not alter or repeal at pleasure, including the time of voting, the qualifications of electors, and the time of the meeting of the legislature. I should like to see this plan tried. The Territory is entitled to this consideration at our hands. It has 64,356 people and is larger in population and area than any other Territory at the time it was organized, including Mississippi, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, Wisconsin, Oregon, Minnesota, Utah, Washington, Dakota, Nevada, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming, and its population is more dense per square mile than any of these States were when they were given Territorial government, while the white population of Alaska has increased from 2,186 in 1880 to 6,121 in 1890, and to 30,493 in 1900 and 36,347 in 1910. The judicial districts which constitute the unit or representative subdivision, from which the members of the legislature are to be chosen, contain 15,216 in the first judicial district, 12,361 in the second, 20,073 in the third, and 16,711 in the fourth subdivision.

Our Government paid to Russia $7,200,000 for Alaska in 1867, and have expended in appropriations since that date $28,608,674, or a total for this investment of $35,816,674, and in return this vast and unexplored empire has contributed to the tangible wealth of the Union nearly $200,000,000 in gold, nearly $10,000,000 in copper, over $51,000,000 in fur-seal skins, over $20,000,000 in other furs, nearly $150,000,000 in fishery products, and over $17,000,000 in revenue receipts and other products, all aggregating nearly $450,000,000. There is nothing comparable to this wonderful development in the history of any like territorial area in our country. While its vast resources still await the real touch of enterprise and opportunity, no one pretends to comprehend the extent of its coal and copper deposits, but future generations will draw upon it for manifold blessings.

Commercially, Alaska is closely related to our people and its trade flows through American channels. We do more business with the people of Alaska than we do with either Scotland, Spain, Austria-Hungary, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, and other European States with whom we have treaties of commerce and amity, while the trade with this rich possession exceeds our trade with Hawaii, the Philippines, and Porto Rico, and most of the South American Republics, aggregating annually more than $56,000,000. To treat this dependency ungenerously would not be creditable to us as a Nation, while our solicitude will foster the American spirit and people this rich possession with hardy American pioneers who will prove a source of strength in the development of its vast natural resources, permanently extending the zone of American influence and widening the markets for the products of American genius.

Mr. HEYBURN. I realize that we have got to try this out, and if we find it is not practicable or that the law fails in application, we will have to change it. The Delegate from Alaska is excellent authority in regard to these questions. He was the United States judge in Alaska for a number of years. He has traveled over it generally, and I would be inclined to accept his conclusions in regard to the matter, always applying such knowledge as I might have from other sources.

Now, the Delegate from Alaska is a very robust and hardy pioneer. He has made those trips behind dogs on sledges under conditions that, perhaps, not one member selected to the legislature out of twenty could endure. It is not probable that all the men sent to the legislature in Alaska will have the robust strength of the Delegate from Alaska. So you will have to pay some attention to the selection of candidates for the legislature and their physical conditions, perhaps, more than to their other accomplishments. Sometimes the ice is out at the 10th of May, but I can readily recall occasions when it was not out for 30 days after that time.

I merely desired the RECORD to show that these questions received attention at the time of the enactment of the legislation.

I came out of Alaska on one occasion certainly late in November. It would have been very difficult for any but robust persons to make the trip at that time. The snow was several feet deep, and it was snowing every day and piling up. I do not know how much it continued to pile up after I left Alaska, but when I left there was snow enough on the ground to supply all of the United States. I think it stayed there the following spring until some time in June. I do not think the river is open until considerably after the 1st of June. We are taking chances on the rooming of the legislature at the capital. I think if the suggestion made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], that they might want to get away sooner, were put into practical operation you would find they would not be able to get away, perhaps, for a month or six weeks after the adjournment, and some provision should be made for provisioning the members of the legislature until they could return to their homes.

I was just thinking as the measure was being read that perhaps this legislature would be inspired with the brilliant idea of establishing a system of primary elections. The primary elections would necessarily come along during January and February, or else they would come along in the fall before the general election and after the rivers were closed. If they contemplate multiplying elections in Alaska as they have been multiplying them in other parts of the United States, the people who took an interest in politics might count on spending all their time either going to or returning from a primary or a general election for the legislature. I think each of them would occupy about one-third of the year. So we would have of necessity a class of men in Alaska whose sole and exclusive business it was to participate in the political affairs of that Territory. Probably that might work out very well. They might become accustomed to it and trained to it, and might eventually develop into what are sometimes called statesmen; that is, men who make a business of engaging in political affairs. We never know whether a man is a statesman or not unless he does. I have heard it suggested that there are in the great body of the people others who are capable of being statesmen, but the only way in which a statesman is really developed is by experience in the open field of political controversy.

I have called attention to these matters in order that when, after the first attempt to elect and convene a legislature, and to perform the duties of such a body results in a failure of half the members to reach the place where the legislature meets, or a failure of the citizenship to elect anybody to the legislature, because there is no one left in the country on account of it being a closed season, I shall after those conditions have developed and we are called upon to change the time, I suppose, as suggested by the Senator from Michigan, we can change the duties; but you will have to provide for sending to the legislature very stalwart men if you expect them to reach the capital between the 1st of December, which would be as early as they could gather their dogs and pack their sledges with pemmican and a few other things they might need to bring with them, and the time the legislature meets. Alaska should have some local self-government, but it ought to be in the summer time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Territories was, in section 6, page 6, line 8, after the word "governor," to insert "which shall set forth the object thereof and give at least 30 days' written notice to each member of said legislature"; in line 12, before the word "days," to strike out "30" and insert "15"; in line 13, after the word "session," to strike out "not longer than 30" and insert "for a period not exceeding 15"; and in line 16, before the word "public," to strike out "grave," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. Convening and sessions of legislature: That the Legislature of Alaska shall convene at the capitol at the city of Juneau, Alaska, on the first Monday in March in the year 1913 and on the first Monday in March every two years thereafter; but the said legislature shall not continue in session longer than 60 days in any two years unless again convened in extraordinary session by a proclamation of the governor, which shall set forth the object thereof and give at least 30 days' written notice to each member of said legislature, and in such case shall not continue in session longer than 15 days. The governor of Alaska is hereby authorized to convene the legislature in extraordinary session for a period not exceeding 15 days when requested to do so by the President of the United States, or when any public danger or necessity may require it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if it is the intention, by section 6, to provide for an unlimited number of extraordinary sessions of the legislature in Alaska, or is it the intention to limit the number to one extraordinary session in two years?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the committee thought the time during which the legislature could sit on call of the governor should be limited to 15 days.

Mr. FALL. I think the committee has carried that out all right, for, even though the legislature can be called in extraordinary session only once upon the initiative of the governor, it can be called in session as many times as the President of the United States may see fit to call them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Exactly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 6, line 19, after the word "legislature," to strike out "shall convene under the law, the senate and house of representatives shall each" and insert "convenes it shall"; in line 21, after the words "one of," to strike out "their number" and insert "its members"; in line 22, after the word "designated," to strike out "in the case of the senate as 'president of the senate' and in the case of the house of representatives"; in line 24, after the words "of the," to strike out "house of representatives" and insert "legislature"; in line 25, after the word "election," to strike out "by each body of the" and insert "of the following"; and, in line 26, after the word "officers," to strike out "provided for the house of representatives in section 1861 of the United States Revised Statutes of 1878, and each of said subordinate officers shall receive the compensation provided in that section" and insert "One chief clerk, who shall receive a compensation of $8 per day, and of one assistant clerk, one enrolling clerk, one engrossing clerk, one sergeant at arms, one doorkeeper, one messenger, and one watchman, who shall each receive a compensation of $5 per day during the sessions, and no charge for a greater number of officers and attendants, or any larger per diem, shall be allowed or paid by the United States to the Territory of Alaska," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. Organization of the legislature: That when the legislature convenes it shall organize by the election of one of its members as presiding officer, who shall be designated as "speaker of the legislature," and by the election of the following subordinate officers: One chief clerk, who shall receive a compensation of $8 per day, and of one assistant clerk, one enrolling clerk, one engrossing clerk, one sergeant at arms, one doorkeeper, one messenger, and one watchman, who shall each receive a compensation of $5 per day during the sessions, and no charge for a greater number of officers and attendants, or any larger per diem, shall be allowed or paid by the United States to the Territory of Alaska: Provided, That no person shall be employed for whom salary, wages, or compensation is not provided in the appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I should like to propose an amendment to that section by inserting after the word "clerks," in line 7, the words "one journal clerk."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will wait until after the committee amendments have been completed.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

Mr. JONES. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona is to an amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it is an amendment to a committee amendment, it can be offered now.

Mr. ASHURST. I think the distinguished Senator from Michigan will observe the necessity for a journal clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Arizona to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 7, after the words "engrossing clerk," it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting "one journal clerk."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Arizona will permit me, we have followed the exact language of the statute with reference to the organization of the United States House of Representatives, and I think under the general power conferred they will have the right to select a journal clerk.

Mr. ASHURST. These officials are to be paid for by the United States. I will simply say that when the Western States were Territories, before they were erected into States, they had journal clerks and they were found to be necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have, as I have stated, followed the statute, and I am inclined to think that we have provided enough places for the Legislature of Alaska.

Mr. ASHURST. It is necessary that a record of the proceedings should be kept. The enrolling clerk can not do that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The record can be kept by the clerk.

Mr. ASHURST. By what clerk?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By the clerk of the legislature.

Mr. ASHURST. He will not have an opportunity to write out the journal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. An assistant clerk is provided, and it seems to me that is ample.

Mr. ASHURST. My experience in legislatures throughout the West makes me feel that it is important to propose the amendment and to suggest to the Senate that a proper record should be kept, and that a journal clerk is necessary, because the chief clerk or his assistant and the enrolling and engrossing clerks could hardly perform the work.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We all feel as the Senator from Arizona does, that a record should be kept; but we think the clerk and assistant clerk ought to be competent to do that work. We have followed the statute and we feel that we have gone as far as we ought to go. No such request has been made on the part of the Delegate from Alaska or anyone else. If they have not sufficient clerks to do that work of course that will have to be provided for later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 7, line 16, after the words "by the," to strike out "legislative assembly" and insert "legislature"; in line 18, after the word "Alaska," to strike out "To avoid improper influences which may result from intermixing in one and the same act such things as have no proper relation to each other, every"; in line 21, before the word "law," to insert "No"; in the same line, after the word "embrace," to strike out "but" and insert "more than"; in the same line, after the word "subject," to strike out "and that" and insert "which"; and in line 22, before the word "title," to strike out "the" and insert "its," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. Enacting clause—Subject of act: That the enacting clause of all laws passed by the legislature shall be "Be it enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska." No law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 8, line 15, before the words "of business," to strike out "conducting" and insert "conduct"; and in line 23, after the word "association," to insert "but the authority embraced in this section shall only permit the organization of corporations or associations whose chief business shall be in the Territory of Alaska," so as to read:

SEC. 9. Legislative power—Limitations: The legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, but no law shall be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; no tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States; nor shall the lands or other property of nonresidents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents; nor shall the legislature grant to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise without the affirmative approval of Congress; nor shall the legislature pass local or special laws in any of the cases enumerated in the act of July 30, 1886; nor shall it grant private charters or special privileges, but it may, by general act, permit persons to associate themselves together as bodies corporate for manufacturing, mining, agricultural, and other industrial pursuits, and for the conduct of business of insurance, savings banks, banks of discount and deposit (but not of issue), loans, trust, and guaranty associations, for the establishment and conduct of cemeteries, and for the construction and operation of railroads, wagon roads, vessels, and irrigating ditches, and the colonization and improvement of lands in connection therewith, or for colleges, seminaries, churches, libraries, or any other benevolent, charitable, or scientific association, but the authority embraced in this section shall only permit the organization of corporations or associations whose chief business shall be in the Territory of Alaska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 10, line 15, before the word "indebtedness," to insert "authorized"; in the same line, after the word "indebtedness," to strike out "incurred, or warrants or other evidences of indebtedness issued"; on page 11, line 3, after the word "no," to strike out "act" and insert "acts"; and in line 9, after the word "null," to strike out "utterly," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That all authorized indebtedness shall be paid in the order of its creation; all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects and shall be levied and collected under general laws, and the assessments shall be according to the actual value thereof. No tax shall be levied for Territorial purposes in excess of 1 per cent upon the assessed valuation of property therein in any one year; nor shall any incorporated town or municipality levy any tax, for any purpose, in excess of 2 per cent of the assessed valuation of property within the town in any one year: Provided, That the Congress reserves the exclusive power for five years from the date of the approval of this act to fix and impose any tax or taxes upon railways or railway property in Alaska, and no acts or laws passed by the Legislature of Alaska providing for a county form of government therein shall have any force or effect until it shall be submitted to and approved by the affirmative action of Congress; and all laws passed, or attempted to be passed, by such legislature in said Territory inconsistent with the provisions of this section shall be null and void: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held to abridge the right of the legislature to modify the qualifications of electors by extending the elective franchise to women.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, page 11, line 15, before the word "shall," to strike out "senate and house of representatives" and insert "legislature"; in the same line, after the word "shall," to strike out "each"; in line 18, after the word "members," to strike out "of either house"; in line 20, after the word "entered," to strike out "on" and insert "upon"; in line 21, before the word "members," to strike out "number of"; in line 22, before the word "shall," to strike out "to which each house is entitled"; in the same line, after the word "quorum," to strike out "of such house"; in line 23, before the word "business," to strike out "ordinary"; in the same line, after the word "business," to strike out "of which quorum a majority vote shall suffice" and insert "and no legislative act shall be valid unless voted for by at least nine members"; and on page 12, line 3, before the words "may provide," to strike out "each house" and insert "the legislature," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. Rules, quorum, and majority: That the legislature shall choose its own officers, determine the rules of its own proceedings not inconsistent with this act, and keep a journal of its proceedings; that the ayes and noes of the members on any question shall, at the request of one-fifth of the members present, be entered upon the journal; that a majority of the members shall constitute a quorum for the conduct of business, and no legislative act shall be valid unless voted for by at least nine members; that a smaller number than a quorum may adjourn from day to day and compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as the legislature may provide; that for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a quorum present the presiding officer shall count and report the actual number of members present.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, page 12, line 19, after the word "functions," to strike out "in either house"; in line 22, after the word "attendance," to strike out "at" and insert "upon"; and in the same line, after the word "sessions," to strike out "of the respective houses" and insert "thereof," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. Exemptions of legislators: That no member of the legislature shall be held to answer before any other tribunal for any words uttered in the exercise of his legislative functions. That the members of the legislature shall, in all cases except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance upon the sessions thereof, and in going to and returning from the same: Provided, That such privilege as to going and returning shall not cover a period of more than 10 days each way, except in the second division, when it shall extend to 20 days each way, and the fourth division to 15 days each way.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 13, page 13, line 4, after the word "readings," to strike out "in each house"; in line 5, after the word "which," to strike out "in each house"; in line 6, after the word "members," to strike out "to which such house is entitled"; in line 8, after the words "by the," to strike out "house in which it originated or in which amendments thereto shall have originated" and insert "legislature"; in line 10, after the words "immediately be," to strike out "engrossed" and insert "enrolled and"; and in line 11, after the word "clerk," to strike out "and sent to the other house for consideration," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. Passage of laws: That a bill in order to become a law shall have three separate readings, the final passage of which shall be by a majority vote of all the members taken by ayes and noes, and entered upon its journal. That every bill, when passed by the legislature, shall immediately be enrolled and certified by the presiding officer and the clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, page 13, line 16, after the words "shall be," to strike out "certified by the presiding officers and clerks of both houses and shall thereupon be"; in line 19, after the word "law," to insert "at the expiration of 90 days thereafter, unless sooner given effect by a two-thirds vote of said legislature"; on page 14, line 2, after the word "governor," to strike out "each house of"; and in line 7, after the word "members," to strike out "to which each house is entitled," so as to make the section read:

That every bill which shall have passed the legislature shall be presented to the governor. If he approves it, he shall sign it and it shall become a law at the expiration of 90 days thereafter, unless sooner given effect by a two-thirds vote of said legislature. If the governor does not approve such bill, he may return it, with his objections, to the legislature. He may veto any specific item or items in any bill which appropriates money for specific purposes, but shall veto other bills, if at all, only as a whole. That upon the receipt of a veto message from the governor the legislature shall enter the same at large upon its journal and proceed to reconsider such bill, or part of a bill, and again vote upon it by ayes and noes, which shall be entered upon its journal. If, after such reconsideration, such bill or part of a bill shall be approved by a two-thirds vote of all the members it shall thereby become a law. That if the governor neither signs nor vetoes a bill within three days (Sundays excepted) after it is delivered to him, it shall become a law without his signature, unless the legislature adjourns sine die prior to the expiration of such three days. If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within three days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the legislature, by its adjournment, prevents the return of the bill, in which case it shall not be a law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, page 15, line 11, before the word "resolutions," to strike out "joint"; in line 15, after the word "make," to strike out "provision" and insert "provisions"; and in line 16, before the word "resolutions," to strike out "joint," so as to make the section read:

Mr. CRAWFORD. The committee instruct me to offer an amendment, on page 1, in line 3, reducing the amount from $61,554.74 to $20,981.38.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the word "That," it is proposed to strike out "$61,555.74" and to insert "$20,981.38."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 5, after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

To pay $1,000 to Alice M. Burrows, widow of Leslie Burrows, late rural mail carrier on route No. 2, Coal Run, Ohio, who lost his life in discharge of his duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 17, to strike out:

To pay $2,500 to Pedro Sanches, as compensation for the loss of both hands, which were blown off by a premature explosion of dynamite in Culebra Cut, Canal Zone, on March 16, 1908.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 9, before the word "five," to strike out "one thousand," and in line 10, after the word "injuries," to strike out "and the loss of a leg" and insert "sustained," so as to make the clause read:

To pay $500 to Benjamin Demorest, for personal injuries sustained while employed on the United States lighthouse tender Oleander, on the Mississippi River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 12, to strike out the following clause:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, everything was stricken out of this bill except personal-injury claims. I move, therefore, at the end of line 8, on the first page, after the word "part," that a period be inserted instead of the comma, and that after the word "part," in the same line, the following words be stricken out:

And to pay certain other claims arsing under the various departments of the United States Government as hereinafter stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 8, strike out the comma at the end of the line and insert a period.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What does the Senator propose to do with the next line?

Mr. CRAWFORD. To strike it out.

The SECRETARY. And it is proposed to strike out, beginning in line 9, the following:

And to pay certain other claims arising under the various departments of the United States Government as hereinafter stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the period after the word "part" in line 8.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think that should be a semicolon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be better.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DESERTIONS FROM THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17483) amending section 1998 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to authorize the President, in certain cases, to mitigate or remit the loss of rights of citizenship imposed by law upon deserters from the military or naval service.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 13, after the word "interests," to insert a colon and the following proviso:

And provided further, That the provisions of section 1118 of the Revised Statutes of the United States that no deserter from the military service of the United States shall be enlisted or mustered into the military service, and the provisions of section 2 of the act of Congress approved August 1, 1894, entitled "An act to regulate enlistments in the Army of the United States," shall not be construed to preclude the reenlistment or muster into the Army of any person who has deserted, or may hereafter desert, from the military service of the United States in time of peace, or of any soldier whose service during his last preceding term of enlistment has not been honest and faithful, whenever the reenlistment or muster into the military service of such person or soldier shall, in view of the good conduct of such person or soldier subsequent to such desertion or service, be authorized by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to offer an amendment, to be known as section 2, which I send to the desk. It simply makes the provisions of the bill applicable to the Navy as well as the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That section 1420 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the acts of Congress approved May 12, 1879, and February 23, 1881, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1420. No minor under the age of 14 years, no insane or intoxicated person, and no person who has deserted in time of war from the naval or military service of the United States shall be enlisted in the naval service."

That section 1624, article 19, of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of Congress approved May 12, 1879, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1624. Article 19. Any officer who knowingly enlists into the naval service any person who has deserted in time of war from the naval or military service of the United States, or any insane or intoxicated person, or any minor between the ages of 14 and 18 years, without the consent of his parents or guardian, or any minor under the age of 14 years, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish to be understood as objecting in any manner to this bill, but I should like to have some little explanation of it. I do not know really what it provides.

Mr. BRISTOW. The present law imposes upon a deserter in the Army or the Navy in time of peace, if it is simply for some dereliction, as if he became intoxicated and is gone a day or two and comes back, the same penalty as if he deserted in time of war in the face of the enemy. It disfranchises him, and he can not have the rights of citizenship, and he can never enlist. There is no forgiveness.

The Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War have felt for years that desertion because of some trivial matter in time of peace should not be punished so severely. Frequently a soldier who may have deserted in that way wants to reenlist. According to the statute he is barred from reenlistment. Even years of good conduct will not excuse him.

This bill simply enables the President to make an exception in such cases, when the offense has been committed in time of peace.

Mr. BACON. That is the general drift and purpose of the bill?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes, sir; that is it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act amending sections 1998, 1420, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to authorize the President, in certain cases, to mitigate or remit the loss of rights of citizenship imposed by law upon deserters from the military or naval service, and to authorize certain reenlistments in the Army and naval service."

STANDARDIZATION OF APPLES AND APPLE BARRELS.

Mr. WATSON. I am directed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21480) to establish a standard barrel and standard grades for apples when packed in barrels, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 968) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I will ask the Senator from West Virginia whether or not this bill relates in any way to apples packed in boxes?

Mr. WATSON. It does not.

Mr. JONES. Does it attempt in any way to regulate or standardize apples?

Mr. WATSON. It does. It attempts to standardize apples that are shipped in barrels.

If the Senator will wait until the committee amendments have been stated he will understand it better.

Mr. JONES. I do not like to object to the Senator's bill, but it is a matter in which our people are very much interested. I should like to have an opportunity to look it over.

Mr. WATSON. I ask the Senator to wait until he hears the committee amendments read.

Mr. JONES. I will wait until I hear them read.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I understand this bill has passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote; I consider it a very important and a very useful bill to all persons engaged in the growth and sale of apples; and I hope the Senator from Washington will withdraw his objection.

Mr. JONES. I have not made any objection to the consideration of the bill, but I desire to know what the amendments are. My people are very much interested in this matter, and I do not want their rights to be jeopardized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 strike out the letters "U. S." where they appear before the word "standard," in line 8, and also in line 10 and line 13; on page 3, line 21, after the word "shall," insert the word "knowingly"; in line 23, after the word "dollar," insert "and costs"; and after the word "jurisdiction," in line 25, page 3, strike out down to and including the word "eight," in line 7, page 4.

Mr. CLAPP. The letters "U. S." should be stricken out wherever they occur in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. I desire to say that I have had no communication from the people of my State in reference to the measure. I understand it only standardizes apples packed in barrels. Therefore I will not object.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments which have been stated, as well as those suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], will be regarded as agreed to now as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have had much correspondence in regard to this proposed legislation. I do not happen to have it in the Chamber, because I did not anticipate that the measure would now be up for consideration. I would not undertake from memory to state just what application it would have, but I ask the Senator reporting the bill if it affects apples other than those shipped when packed in barrels?

Mr. WATSON. It does not in any way affect apples except those packed in barrels.

Mr. HEYBURN. Apples shipped in bulk, in cars, would not be affected?

Mr. WATSON. No; not in any way.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not catch any provision in the bill which required them to be marked at all. In other words, would it not be possible just to ship them marking them "apples" without making any statement in regard to them?

Mr. WATSON. In bulk?

Mr. HEYBURN. In barrels.

Mr. WATSON. They can be shipped in anyway, in barrels, without putting the standard grades on them?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no prohibition against packing apples in barrels and shipping them and just marking them "apples"?

Mr. WATSON. None whatever.

Mr. HEYBURN. But if you undertook to make a statement, it must be true?

Mr. WATSON. It must be correct.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the extent of it?

I regret I did not know the measure was coming up, in order that I might have looked over the correspondence. There are very large growers who pack in boxes and who also ship in bulk and in barrels across our State lines, between the State of Washington, the State of Idaho, the State of Montana, and the State of Utah. The apples are shipped in large quantities in the car in bulk for the purpose of being sorted and packed or converted into other products.

I would not want to see our people embarrassed by legislation to which we do not give more consideration than we are able at this time to give to the pending bill. But on the assurance of the Senator from West Virginia that this bill does not undertake to regulate in any way apples except those packed and shipped in barrels and that this only requires that the statements made shall be true, I do not object.

Mr. WATSON. I can assure the Senator that his constituents have withdrawn opposition to the bill and are satisfied with it.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have two classes of shippers; we have the boxers and we have the others.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply wish to say, Mr. President, that the importance of this legislation has been impressed upon me from various sources by the people of my State. The Apple Growers' Association out there are practically a unit in favor of this legislation, saying it will be wholesome and helpful, and I hope the bill will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will resume stating the committee amendments.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, strike out the initials "U. S."; in line 14 strike out the initials "U. S."; in line 20, after the word "shall," insert "knowingly."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer the amendment to section 1 which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "inches," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That steel barrels containing the interior dimensions provided for in this section shall be construed as a compliance therewith.

Mr. WATSON. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 8, 9, and 13, and on page 3, lines 9 and 14, after the word "standard," insert the word "grade."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DANIEL W. ABBOTT.

Mr. PAGE obtained the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me, before he calls up the larger measure, to call up a House bill on the calendar, which it will take but a moment to consider? I should like to have unanimous consent for its present consideration. It will not be in the way of the larger measure.

Mr. PAGE. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12375) authorizing Daniel W. Abbott to make homestead entry.

The bill is favorably reported from the committee, and it is to authorize Daniel W. Abbott to make certain homestead entries under conditions where his rights have been wrongfully forfeited.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I gave notice some days ago that on July 24 I would ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 3) to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades, and industries and home economics in secondary schools; in maintaining instruction in these vocational subjects in State normal schools; in maintaining extension departments in State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

I realize that there are several Senators here who have short bills to which there is no objection which they wish to call up. Therefore I will ask consent to call up the bill, and after 15 minutes I will ask that it be laid aside. I have a few unimportant amendments which I should like to submit to perfect the bill, and having them here, if Senators will give me unanimous consent to bring up the bill at this time, having offered them, I will yield and allow the bill to be laid aside.

I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, will the Senator withdraw his request for a moment, until I can ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a short bill which can be very quickly disposed of?

Mr. PAGE. I would be very happy to do so but for the fact that there are several other Senators who have bills which they desire taken up, and I would hardly feel like giving way at this time. I shall promise to be very brief about my bill, if I can have unanimous consent to have it taken up now.

Mr. THORNTON. Does the Senator expect the bill to be taken up and disposed of?

Mr. PAGE. No. I say I will not take more than 15 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read and certain amendments have been agreed to. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill that he may propose further amendments. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PAGE. On page 2, line 7, after the word "grade," I move to insert a comma; on line 8, after the word "education," I move to insert "in agriculture and home making for persons above 12 years of age, and in the trades and industries."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 6, line 13, I move to strike out the word "four" before the word "hundred" and insert the word "six," and in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighty" and insert "forty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 7, line 22, I move to strike out the word "four" and insert "six"; in line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighty" and insert "forty"; and in line 25, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 8, line 1, after the word "allotted," I move to strike out "to each of the 48 States for the benefit of such departments or divisions of education" and insert:

For the use and benefit of said departments or divisions of education in land-grant colleges in each of the 16 States which maintain separate land-grant colleges for persons of the colored race, $10,000 of which shall be for the education of persons of the white race and $10,000 for the education of persons of the colored race; and $10,000 shall be annually allotted for the use and benefit of said departments or divisions of education in each of those States which do not maintain separate land-grant colleges for persons of the colored race.

I want to say, in regard to the amendment, that it was in the bill originally, and upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia, or, I think, the Senator from South Carolina, it was stricken out. Now, as I understand, they consent that it be restored, and I make that motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire that the amendment shall be adopted with the impression that I consent to it. I wish to act hereafter as I shall see fit in the premises without any committal now. As I understand the plan of the bill it is to give special support to our negro agricultural colleges throughout the South. To this I did not object, if it is to in no way interfere with the general appropriation to each State.

Mr. PAGE. That is exactly what the amendment does and nothing more, I will say to the Senator, and I think it fully carries out the purpose which he and I discussed together and on which we have about agreed. But if there is any objection hereafter I shall be very glad to meet his wishes in the matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On line 12, I move to strike out the words "household arts" and insert "home economics."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 11, line 10, I move to strike out the words "by making" and insert the words "to make."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. At the end of the same line, following the word "in," I move to insert the words "relation to."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On the same page, line 19, I move to strike out the words "by making" and insert the words "to make."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. In the same line, after the word "investigations," I move to insert the words "relating to education and research."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 13, line 8, after the word "thereof," I move to insert the words "or through its board for vocational education."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 25, line 14, after the word "If" and before the word "Congress," I move to insert the words "the next."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 26, line 12, after the word "of," I move to insert the words "either State and local or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I now ask that the bill may be laid aside.

Mr. JONES. Before that is done I should like to suggest an amendment on page 8.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to say that I designed myself to offer that amendment, and with the Senator's consent I will offer it now.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. PAGE. On page 8, before the word "schools," I move to strike out the word "training," and after the word "schools" to insert the words "furnishing special training."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the bill be ordered reprinted as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. PAGE. I see no objection, although aside from the amendments which Senators will recall, they are all practically unimportant.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Still, I think the bill is so important that we ought to have it in its perfected shape.

Mr. PAGE. Of course I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be printed as amended.

Mr. PAGE. I now ask that the bill be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside.

JESUS SILVA, JR.

Mr. CATRON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 24598) for the relief of Jesus Silva, jr.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

It directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause to be issued to Jesus Silva, jr., a patent to the following-described lands: Lots 3, 4, and 5 of sec. 25, T. 21 S., R. 1 W., New Mexico principal meridian, Las Cruces, N. Mex., land district, being the tract embraced in his homestead entry made October 5, 1905, upon which cash certificate issued February 3, 1909. But in said patent there shall be expressly reserved to the United States, or its successors, the right to take or use, without compensation to patentee or his grantees, any or all of the said lands needed for or in connection with the construction, maintenance, and operation of the Rio Grande reclamation project.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNIE G. HAWKINS.

Mr. DU PONT. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 117) granting an increase of pension to Annie G. Hawkins.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie G. Hawkins, widow of Hamilton S. Hawkins, late brigadier general, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not wish to agree to that yet. I wish to see the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is at the desk. Does the Senator desire to have it read?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would ask the Secretary to read the views of the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

Mr. McCUMBER, on the part of the minority of the committee, submits the following views:

The minority of the Committee on Pensions, feeling that the claim for a special bill in this case is wholly unjustified from any standpoint, submit the following reasons for their refusal to concur with the majority of the committee in reporting this bill favorably:

COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS CREATED TO RELIEVE CASES OF DESTITUTION ONLY.

Preceding the rules which have governed the committee for many years, is a note which read as follows:

"NOTE.—The Pension Committees of the two Houses of Congress were created to consider a very few claims in which, from their peculiar circumstances of extreme disability and destitution, adequate relief could not be obtained from the bureau. * * *. Nor is it the policy of the Government to provide full support for soldiers or their widows, but solely to prevent absolute want, and it is believed, therefore, that private pension legislation should be restricted to cases of such extreme destitution as renders assistance imperative."

Rule 7 provides:

"Where the widow of an officer is pensioned under the act of April 19, 1908, an increase will not be recommended in excess of the general-law rating for his rank; in cases where the circumstances suggest that a lower rate would be proper such lower rate only will be recommended."

Rule 7 also provides:

"No increase of pension to widows will be recommended above the general-law rating except in cases of destitution, to be substantiated by competent testimony, and the word "destitution" will be held to mean the same when applied to an officer or his widow as when applied to a private or his widow; it will not be contracted or expanded to meet particular cases."

These rules are recited, first, to show the purposes of private pension legislation; and second, to show wherein the particular case in question should be governed by those rules.

Mrs. Hawkins filed a certificate reporting her income to be about $1,300 a year.

Our rule says, and that rule harmonizes with justice and right, that the word "destitution" shall not be expanded or contracted to meet any special case, but that it shall mean the same when applied to the widow of an officer as when applied to the widow of a private.

The general law may make a distinction, but the special bill, which is intended to reach cases of destitution only, never ought to be used for any other purpose.

If the widow of a private soldier presented her claim for an increase of pension, and in her claim admitted that she had an income of $1,300 a year, such claim would not receive a moment's consideration, and justly so. If we should grant such a widow an increase of pension, then we should by a single law give every other widow a like pension.

Although we have sometimes failed, we consider it our duty to at all times protest against the function of the Committee on Pensions being exercised in selecting a few favorites, granting them pensions when we would not grant them in other cases, and thus laying the committee open to a just criticism, that it is departing from its proper purposes. If Mrs. Hawkins is entitled to $50 per month, then every widow whose income is not more than $1,300 per year, and whose husband gave honorable services during the war, should be granted $50 per month.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, without criticizing the propriety of the rules adopted by the Committee on Pensions, which, in ordinary cases, are doubtless proper and expedient, I submit that at the present time there are 72 widows of officers of the Army and Navy who are drawing pensions from $125 down to $50 a month. In the majority of these cases it is not claimed that the beneficiaries have an income greater than $600 a year, which seems to be the arbitrary line of demarcation between destitution and affluence as established by the Pension Committee; but there are quite a number of cases where the rules in question have been waived and where the condition of the private resources of the beneficiaries will compare favorably with that of Mrs. Hawkins.

The minority report says that—

If Mrs. Hawkins is entitled to $50 per month, then every widow whose income is not more than $1,300 per year and whose husband gave honorable services during the war should be granted $50 per month.

I do not consider this a fair statement, inasmuch as Mrs. Hawkins's claims are based not upon "honorable services during the war"—whatever this may mean—but upon her husband's long, faithful, and honorable service of 49 continuous years in the United States Army—from the beginning of the Civil War, in 1861, until 1910—and more especially and particularly for most extraordinary and distinguished services at the Battle of San Juan, July 1, 1898. At a critical moment of this battle Gen. Hawkins saw that the fortunes of the day could only be retrieved by the capture of the blockhouse on San Juan Hill, the key of the Spanish position, and, after soliciting and receiving permission to advance, he successfully assaulted and carried the position, thereby saving the American Army from serious disaster. As Gen. Hawkins was wounded in this attack, his two aids killed, and one-fourth of his brigade left on the field of battle, I believe it to be not only entirely prudent and safe, but absolutely right and proper for Congress to deliberately establish a precedent for rewarding services of such a character. Few and far between in the future will be those who can present similar claims.

Mrs. Hawkins is almost 70 years of age, infirm in health, and has an invalid daughter dependent upon her for support, and I trust that the bill for her relief may be favorably considered by the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware one question. Does the Senator believe or does he not believe that we ought to have a general law fixing the amount which should be granted to the widows of officers of the Civil War? Does he believe or does he not believe that we ought to have a general law which would treat the widows of officers of a certain rank exactly the same?

Mr. DU PONT. I would say to the Senator from North Dakota that while I believe it proper to establish general rules in regard to the matters to which he refers, I also believe that every general rule has its exceptions, and that when special and extraordinary cases occur they should be considered on their merits. In my judgment, the case of Mrs. Hawkins is wholly exceptional and could not establish a precedent which would be prejudicial to the interests of the Government or unfair to anyone else.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator another question. The Senator has served some time on the Committee on Pensions. I want to ask him if there has been a single case in the matter of the application of the widow of an officer for a pension during the whole time he has been a member of that committee that has not been an exceptional case; that the claim has not been based upon the idea that it was exceptional, and that a greater amount ought to be allowed than is allowed under the general law?

Mr. DU PONT. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota, as far as I am able to judge from my experience on the Pension Committee, that the average cases which come before it are not exceptional, but are subject to the ordinary rules. I can recollect but very few exceptional cases which have come before the Pension Committee. This case is one of them, and I have in mind another case in regard to which a bill is pending which I hope will come before the Senate later——

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota what pension Mrs. Hawkins is getting now?

Mr. DU PONT. I can answer that question. It is $12 a month.

Mr. OVERMAN. She has an income of $1,300?

Mr. McCUMBER. She has a net income of about $1,300.

Mr. OVERMAN. Outside of the pension she is now getting?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think so. I am not certain whether the pension is included or not, but that would make a difference of only $144 in the amount.

Mr. OVERMAN. Her income with the pension she receives now would be about $1,440 a year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word on this amendment. The general law fixes the pension of widows of the higher officers at $30 a month where the cause of death was of service origin. The general law has not seen fit to fix any pension above the $12 per month where the death was not the result of wounds or injury incurred in service. The law of June 27, 1890, specifically provided that in granting pensions to widows of officers and soldiers of the Civil War no distinction should be made on account of rank.

There was a reason for that law. It was the solemn declaration of the Congress of the United States, representing all of the people, that when a grant of pension was made, irrespective of any injury incurred in the service, the amount of $8 per month fixed by the law of June 27, 1890, and of $12 per month fixed by the law of April 19, 1908, should apply with equal force to the widows of all soldiers of the Civil War.

The proposition that I want to put up to Senators is simply this: Ought we to change the law so as to grant all widows of officers a pension of at least $50 per month without respect to their financial condition? If we should do that, in fairness to every one of them we should amend the old law so that instead of providing for $12 a month it should provide for $50 per month to every widow of an officer of the Civil War. We would then have a law that would be equal and just and appropriate; but to pick out the widow of one officer here and another officer there and say that we will make such a case a matter of special consideration, and, without any rule on earth to guide our action, vote all the way from $50 to $150 a month, places the Senate upon an open sea of favoritism where we have nothing to guide us, nothing to restrain us, and no principles of equality to control our action.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. If we should do that, would it not be unfair and unjust to widows of the private soldiers unless we increased their pensions very materially?

Mr. McCUMBER. It certainly would; but, Mr. President, here is another feature; and I want to get back again to the very purpose of having Committees on Pensions in the Senate and in the other House. Why do we have such committees? Is the object of the Committee on Pensions to recommend as many separate laws as there are individuals who might claim a preference, or is the object of the creation of this committee to carry out the purpose of the Government of the United States to reach those cases of destitution where the general law is insufficient? That is the declared purpose of all of this special legislation. If that is the purpose, then there ought to be some rule that should guide us in conferring special favors upon special individuals.

What is that rule? The rule is necessitous condition. The very first thing that we have declared in that rule is that a pension will only be granted by a private law in case of destitution. Then we follow that with another provision—that the word "destitution" shall be exactly the same when applied to the widow of an officer as when applied to the widow of a common soldier, and that it will not be contracted or expanded to meet special cases. I am very certain that the Senator who introduced this bill, who is on the Committee on Pensions, in case an application were made for some poor old woman whose soldier husband served in the trenches and fought the battles of the Government and who has an income of $1,300 a year would join the majority of the committee and declare emphatically that that was not a case of destitution. There ought to be some rule somewhere that would establish what is a case of destitution, and that rule ought not to be graded in a hundred cases from the private up to the commissioned officer.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, this bill does not concern the administration of the pension laws nor their amendment; but the question is whether the Congress of the United States is willing to recognize and reward extraordinary services in battle. I will say that if the case of the humblest private in the United States Army or the case of his widow were under discussion, and if it could be shown by the official records that he performed some act of heroism or which inured to striking military success at a critical moment, I would cheerfully and gladly use all my efforts to specially recognize and reward such action.

It is not a question between officers and privates or between this officer and that officer, but it is a question of special and extraordinary service to the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think, Mr. President, if the Senator would follow that line that we would before this have granted to the widow of every soldier in the Civil War about $50 per month.

Mr. DU PONT. Then, we would have acted very unwisely and very unjustly and in contravention of the official records, which show what has been done and what has not been done.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, it is up to the Senate whether they will hold this committee to a just and fair rule that has been inaugurated not only for the benefit of the committee but for the purpose of securing equal justice between all claimants. Let us remember that there are ten or fifteen thousand of these bills that are referred to the committee during every session, and all of them have to be passed upon in some manner or other.

Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware says that the rule has been waived. The rule has not been waived by the Committee on Pensions; the rule has been faithfully followed by that committee ever since I have been a member of it; but in two or three instances it has been waived by the Senate, which has overruled a number at least of the members of the committee.

The Senator calls attention to the fact that we have in the past granted to a large number of widows $50 per month. I think he will find on a close investigation that in almost every such instance there was a case of destitution made out. I want to call his attention to the further fact, Mr. President, that the widow of a former Senator of the United States, a great statesman, and as capable a general as served in the Civil War, was denied a pension because her income, which was about the same as the income of the widow in this case—it may have been a little more—took her claim without the rule of destitution. I refer to the case of Mrs. Hawley, widow of Gen. Hawley, who was a Senator of the United States for many years. That pension has never been granted to Mrs. Hawley; and there have been a number of other instances where we have refused absolutely to grant pensions because the claimant had failed to establish a case of destitution.

I claim that we should follow that rule, although it was overridden by the Senate, I believe, a short time ago. The question is whether it shall be the rule now to grant pensions in every one of these cases as soon as an application is made. I want Senators to understand that whenever an officer dies his death is almost immediately followed by an application for a special pension on behalf of his widow, no matter what the conditions are. Officers' widows are coming to believe that it is their right to appeal immediately to the Senate and to the House of Representatives and to receive special recognition. I plead for a general law that will treat them all alike. If we can not treat them all alike in a general law, then let us try to treat them with some degree of equality in the Committee on Pensions and in the Senate. If these applications are to be granted irrespective of income, then let us open up the hundreds of cases that have been rejected and bring them in in an omnibus bill and grant all the same rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask what the amendment is?

Mr. DU PONT. It reduces the rate of pension from $75 to $50 per month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 8, it is proposed to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have a vote on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. ASHURST. I want to vote to sustain the chairman of the committee. As a member of that committee I know the great labor he has performed, and I should like to know how to vote to sustain his contention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators in favor of the passage of the bill will say "aye"; those opposed "no." [Putting the question.] The noes manifestly have it, and the Senate refuses to pass the bill.

Mr. DU PONT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

COPYRIGHT LAWS.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 24224) to amend sections 5, 11, and 25 of an act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyrights," approved March 4, 1909.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey subsequently said: I again press my request for the present consideration of House bill 24224. I understand the objection is withdrawn.

Mr. HEYBURN. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota objects.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1739) to amend section 4875, Revised Statutes, to provide a compensation for superintendents of national cemeteries.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that the section referred to be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 4875. The superintendents of the national cemeteries shall receive for their compensation from $60 to $75 a month each, according to the extent and importance of the cemeteries to which they may be respectively assigned, to be determined by the Secretary of War, except the superintendent of the Arlington (Va.) Cemetery, whose compensation may be $100 per month, at the discretion of the Secretary of War; and they shall also be furnished with quarters and fuel at the several cemeteries.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. M. H. MELLON AND OTHERS.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20873) for the relief of J. M. H. Mellon, administrator, James A. Mellon, Thomas D. Mellon, Mrs. E. L. Siverd, J. M. H. Mellon, Bessie Blue, Mrs. Simpson, Annie Turley, C. B. Eyler, Luella C. Pearce, John McCracken, A. J. Mellon, J. J. Martin, Eugene Richmond, Springdale Methodist Episcopal Church, Heidekamp Mirror Co., James P. Confer, jr., W. P. Bigley, W. J. Bole, and S. A. Moyer, all of Allegheny County, Pa.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINING EXPERIMENT STATION IN WYOMING.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call from the calendar the bill (S. 7050) to establish a mining experiment station in the State of Wyoming, to aid in the development of the mineral resources of the United States, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to establish at Lander, Fremont County, Wyo., a mining experiment station, under the supervision, management, and control of the Bureau of Mines, with a superintendent, who shall be an expert mining engineer, at a salary of $4,000 per annum, a metallurgical chemist, at a salary of $3,000 per annum, one assistant mining engineer and one assistant chemist, at a salary of $2,000 per annum each, and such additional technical and clerical assistants as may be found necessary. A sum not to exceed $25,000 is authorized to be spent in establishing, equipping, and maintaining the mining experiment station during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF SPONGE INDUSTRY.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to call up at this time the bill (S. 6385) to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and Straits of Florida; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or disposing of the same; providing means of enforcement of same; and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Fisheries with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "Florida," to insert "outside of State territorial limits," so as to read:

That on and after the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States or person owing duty of obedience to the laws of the United States, or any boat or vessel of the United States or person belonging to or on board such boat or vessel to take or catch any commercial sponges, by means of diving or diving apparatus, in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or Straits of Florida outside of State territorial limits, or to land, deliver, cure, offer for sale, or have in possession at any port or place in the United States or on any boat or vessel of the United States any commercial sponges taken by means of diving in said waters.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 2, line 12, after the word "Florida," to insert "outside of State territorial limits," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any and all persons, boats, or vessels described in the first section of this act to take or catch, by any means or method, in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida outside of State territorial limits, or to land, deliver, cure, offer for sale, or have in possession at any port or place in the United States or on any boat or vessel of the United States, any commercial sponges taken in said waters measuring, when wet, less than 5 inches in their maximum diameter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 3, line 19, after the word "boat," to insert "of the United States"; in line 24, after the word "boat," to insert "of the United States"; in line 1, on page 3, after the word "Florida," to strike out "beyond the jurisdiction of the State of Florida" and insert "outside of State territorial limits," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the presence of sponges on any vessel or boat of the United States equipped with diving apparatus, or serving as a living or deposit boat for divers, between July 1 and October 1 of each year, or the presence of sponges of a diameter less than 5 inches on said vessels at any time, or the presence of sponges of less than the said diameter on any other vessel or boat of the United States engaged in sponging on the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida outside of State territorial limits, or the possession of any sponges of less than the said diameter sold or delivered by such vessels shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, section 5, line 20, after the word "district," to strike out "wherein the offense was committed" and insert "wherein the offender is found or into which he is first brought," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That any violation of this act shall be prosecuted in the district court of the United States of the district wherein the offender is found or into which he is first brought.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to hear the title of the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

A bill to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and Straits of Florida; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or disposing of the same; providing means of enforcement of same; and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The purpose of the bill is to regulate the method of catching sponges.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire of the Senator the purpose of the bill. It seems to prohibit the taking of sponges in the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. FLETCHER. It prohibits the taking of sponges of a smaller size than the size designated outside the territorial limits of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is that the sole purpose—to regulate the size of the sponges that may be taken?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is to regulate the catching, so that the sponge industry will not be destroyed by taking those under size.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the sole purpose of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the sole purpose of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

STREET RAILWAY IN SOUTH HILO, HAWAII.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 18041) granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD as requested.

The report is as follows:

STREET RAILWAY SYSTEM, DISTRICT OF SOUTH HILO, HAWAII.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 18041:

The Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18041) granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii, reports the same without amendment and recommends that the bill do pass.

This bill authorizes the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in and around the town of Hilo, which is the largest town on the island of Hawaii, it having a population of 6,745, according to the census of 1910. The traffic which is expected to support this enterprise is that which will pass between the town of Hilo and the Government wharves now in course of construction near Waiakea Landing, 3 miles from the town of Hilo, where the Federal Government is constructing a breakwater which will furnish the only harbor on the island for deep-sea vessels.

It is expected that this railway will encourage and promote the building of homes between the town of Hilo and its terminus at the Government wharves on lands which are owned by the Government of Hawaii and which home builders will be able to secure at a nominal cost. The road will insure cheap transportation to these people to and from their employment.

The only means of transportation at present from the town of Hilo to the site of the Government wharves is a bus and hack line operated by Japanese, and on which the minimum fare is 25 cents and the maximum fare is 75 cents. The bill reported by your committee limits the charge to 5 cents "for a continuous trip anywhere between any two extreme points within a radius of 3 miles from the intersection of Front and Waianuenue Streets," which embraces the trip from the town of Hilo to the Government wharves.

This proposed franchise was approved by the Hawaiian Legislature in its session of 1911 with but one dissenting vote in the house and none in the senate. The governor of Hawaii, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Interior under date of February 6, 1912, states that "the town of Hilo needs a street railway, and the bill as it stands now with the amendments proposed would sufficiently protect the public now and in the future." The amendments to which the governor referred were inserted in the bill in the House, as will be seen by reference to House Report No. 361, Sixty-second Congress, second session, which was the report of the Committee on Territories to accompany H. R. 18041.

The interests of the public are fully protected by provisions in the bill for extension of the line and limiting the issuance of bonds and stocks, and providing further that the earnings in excess of 8 per cent on the capital stock shall be divided, 25 per cent to the stockholders and 75 per cent to the county of Hawaii. The right to amend or repeal the provisions of this act is reserved in the bill.

For further and detailed information relating to the measure attention is invited to the hearings before the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico in connection with this bill.

REPAYMENT OF WAR TAXES.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 24699) extending the time for the repayment of certain war-revenue taxes erroneously collected.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that all claims for the refunding of any internal tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected under the provisions of section 29 of the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, known as the war-revenue tax, or of any sums alleged to have been excessive, or in any manner wrongfully collected under the provisions of said act may be presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on or before the 1st day of January, 1914, and not thereafter. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to such claimants as have presented or shall hereafter so present their claims, and shall establish such erroneous or illegal assessment and collection, any sums paid by them or on their account or in their interest to the United States under the provisions of the act aforesaid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF SUITS FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6217) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from North Carolina. Does the bill change the present law in any way except about giving the notice?

Mr. OVERMAN. It adds only about six words to the present law, and that is to prevent a conflict of jurisdiction and to make the time certain when the application shall be filed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary will be stated.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, just a moment. I understand that the change in existing law consists in including within the time when the application shall be made any extension of time which the court may have granted in which to plead.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. And that is the only change.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 3, after the word "court," strike out the words "or any time extended or fixed by the court"; and, in line 6, page 2, after the word "plaintiff," to insert the words "not including any extension, by special order, of time to answer or plead," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 29 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 29. Whenever any party entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the last preceding section, except suits removable on the ground of prejudice or local influence, may desire to remove such suit from a State court to the district court of the United States, he may make and file a petition, duly verified, in such suit in such State court at the time, or any time before the defendant is required by the laws of the State or the rule of the State court in which such suit is brought to answer or plead to the declaration or complaint of the plaintiff, not including any extension, by special order, of time to answer or plead for the removal of such suit into the district court to be held in the district where such suit is pending, and shall make and file therewith a bond, with good and sufficient surety, for his or their entering in such district court, within 30 days from the date of filing said petition, a certified copy of the record in such suit, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by the said district court if said district court shall hold that such suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto, and also for their appearing and entering special bail in such suit if special bail was originally requisite therein. It shall then be the duty of the State court to accept said petition and bond and proceed no further in said suit. Written notice of said petition and bond for removal shall be given the adverse party or parties prior to filing the same. The said copy being entered within said 30 days as aforesaid in said district court of the United States, the parties so removing the said cause shall, within 30 days thereafter, plead, answer, or demur to the declaration or complaint in said cause, and the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said district court."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OVERMAN, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 29 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

LIENS OF JUDGMENTS AND DECREES.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 18017) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States."

I wish to state that this is an act to place the State of Louisiana on an equality with the other States in the matter of liens on real estate arising from the recordation of judgments of the Federal courts and does not affect any interest outside of the State of Louisiana. The bill was once reached in regular order on the calendar, but went over on the objection of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], because I could not at that time make as positive a statement as to the effect of the bill as the Senator from Arkansas thought necessary. I am now able to state absolutely that the bill is confined in its operations to the State of Louisiana. The matter is fully explained in the report of the Judiciary Committee submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to repeal section 3 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States," approved August 1, 1888.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill:

This act shall take effect on and after January 1, 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have the report accompanying the bill printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 802, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

REGULATION OF LIENS OF JUDGMENTS AND DECREES OF COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 18017:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18017) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States," approved August 1, 1888, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with an amendment as follows:

After the word "repealed," in line 6, insert a new paragraph:

"This act shall take effect on and after January 1, 1913."

The report of the House committee thereon, which fully explains the purposes and necessities of the proposed legislation, is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

The House report is as follows:

"The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18017) to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States,' approved August 1, 1888, report the same to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

"The act which this bill seeks to amend is as follows:

"'Be it enacted, etc., That judgments and decrees rendered in a circuit or district court of the United States within any State shall be liens on property throughout such State in the same manner and to the same extent and under the same conditions only as if such judgments and decrees had been rendered by a court of general jurisdiction of such State: Provided, That whenever the laws of any State require a judgment or decree of a State court to be registered, recorded, docketed, indexed, or any other thing to be done, in a particular manner, or in a certain office or county, or parish in the State of Louisiana, before a lien shall attach, this act shall be applicable therein whenever and only whenever the laws of such State shall authorize the judgments and decrees of the United States courts to be registered, recorded, docketed, indexed, or otherwise conformed to the rules and requirements relating to the judgments and decrees of the courts of the State.

"'SEC. 2. That the clerks of the several courts of the United States shall prepare and keep in their respective offices complete and convenient indices and cross indices of the judgment records of said courts, and such indices and records shall at all times be open to the inspection and examination of the public.

"'SEC. 3. Nothing herein shall be construed to require the docketing of a judgment or decree of a United States court, or the filing of a transcript thereof, in any State office within the same county or parish in the State of Louisiana, in which the judgment or decree is rendered, in order that such judgment or decree may be a lien on any property within such county.

"'Approved August 1, 1888.'

"The main purpose of the law is to give to any State the right to require that judgments and decrees of the United States courts in that State shall become liens in the same manner as judgments and decrees of the courts of that State are made liens. It provides that whenever the laws of a State require that a judgment or decree of a court of that State shall be registered, recorded, docketed, or indexed in a certain office in order to create a lien, then the State may, by appropriate legislation, authorize judgments and decrees of a court of the United States, held within that State, to be registered, etc., in the same manner, and otherwise conform to the laws of the State relating to judgments and decrees of the State courts.

"Section 2, which is sought to be repealed by this bill, makes an exception to this rule. It provides that a judgment or decree of a United States court need not be registered or a transcript thereof filed in a State office in any county where the judgment is rendered in order to create a lien on property in that county. If this bill becomes a law it will abolish that exception and make the rule uniform throughout the country. Judgments and decrees of United States courts will be required then to conform everywhere to the same regulation as judgments and decrees of the State courts in order to become a lien.

"A number of the States have adopted a land-registration system commonly known as the Torrens law. Under that law persons owning real estate may have their titles registered in the office of the registrar of titles. The owner then may have at any time an official certificate from the registrar of titles showing the state of his title. The registrar, however, is required to note in this certificate only such matters as are of record in his office. Under the State law all judgments and decrees sought to be made liens on registered land must be registered in the office of the registrar of titles. Likewise judgments and decrees of the United States courts must be so registered there if the United States court is not held in the county where the land is situated in order to create a lien on the registered land. But by section 3, which this bill seeks to repeal, judgments and decrees of the United States courts rendered in counties where the registered land is situated need not be registered in the office of the registrar of titles in order to become liens on the land. Since, under the law, the registrar is not bound to certify as to liens and other matters not appearing of record in his office, his certificate does not cover judgments or decrees in the United States courts if such court is held in that county. The purpose of this land-registration system is to simplify titles and to render them more certain and to reduce the expense pertaining to the abstracting of titles. It has been adopted in a number of States already, namely, Illinois, Ohio, California, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Oregon, Colorado, and perhaps others.

"It has always been the policy of Congress to defer to the States the manner of regulating the titles to land in their respective jurisdictions. In consonance with this policy it enacted the first section of the act above quoted. With the same end in view it enacted the law providing that judgments and decrees of the Federal courts shall cease to be liens on land in the same manner and at like periods as judgments and decrees of the State courts.

"As further proof of this policy we call attention to the Federal statute relating to attachments. It provides that the plaintiff in common-law causes in the district courts shall be entitled to similar remedies, by attachment or other process, against the property of the defendant as are provided by the laws of the State. Likewise, in regard to execution the Federal statute is to the effect that the person having judgment shall be entitled to the same remedies upon it, by execution or otherwise, to reach the property of the judgment debtor as are provided in like cases by the State laws.

"Congress pursued that policy further by requiring that all practice, pleadings, forms, and methods of proceeding in all cases other than equity and admiralty in the district courts shall conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings, forms, and methods of proceeding in the State courts in like cases. The Federal statute also provides that the marshal shall have in each State the same power in executing the laws of the United States as the sheriff in such State has in executing the laws of that State. By analogy, judgments and decrees of the United States courts, in order to become liens on land, should be required to conform in all cases to the regulations of the several States governing the liens of judgments and decrees in the State courts.

"The benefit arising out of this proposed change is not limited to those States alone where the land-registration system above mentioned is in force. It will be useful in simplifying titles in every county in the United States where a United States district court is held. It in effect fixes one certain place in all those counties where the records will be required to show all judgment liens, that place being the one designated by the laws of that State for the registering, docketing, recording, or indexing of judgments and decrees of the State courts. It places those counties where Federal courts are held under the same rule as all other counties."

The committee recommend that the bill so amended do pass.

SYLVESTER G. PARKER.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 5262) to correct the military record of Capt. Sylvester G. Parker.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged volunteer officers, Sylvester G. Parker, who was a captain of Company H, Sixty-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as of said organization on the 4th day of September, 1863: Provided, That no pension, bounty, or arrears of pay shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Sylvester G. Parker."

CORNELIA C. BRAGG.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 25598) granting a pension to Cornelia Bragg.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, after the name "Cornelia," to insert the initial "C.," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cornelia C. Bragg, widow of Edward S. Bragg, late a brigadier general of United States Volunteers during the late Civil War, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "fifty," before the word "dollars," on page 2, line 1, and inserting the words "one hundred."

Mr. SMOOT. I did not catch what the amendment is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, before the word "dollars," strike out the word "fifty" and insert "one hundred."

Mr. SMOOT. I object to that amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word in behalf of the amendment.

This lady is 82 years old. It is not necessary to discuss the military services rendered by her husband. They are well known. Although he was entitled to a pension he never would accept one until 1906. After he became totally disabled, without any income himself, he was finally persuaded by his friends to accept a pension of $50. A few weeks ago Congress passed a bill increasing his pension to $100. He died, I believe, within two days after the bill was approved.

His widow, now 82 years old, is without any income whatsoever. She has a small home worth, I have heard it stated, variously from $2,000 to perhaps $3,000 or $4,000. She is obliged to have an attendant all the while, and is confined to her bed a large part of the time.

I feel under the circumstances that the pension I propose is simply rendering a just tribute to her husband for the services he rendered this country during the late war. I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I certainly must object to the amendment, for the reason that there are hundreds of widows of brigadier generals who are drawing a pension of $50 a month, and their husbands had a military record just as good as that of Brig. Gen. Bragg.

I know that the Senator from Ohio, being a member of the committee, understands that $50 is the rule of the committee, and the bill was reported from the committee at that amount. I sincerely trust the Senate will not vote more than $50 in this particular case. If the Senator insists upon the amendment I am so insistent upon the point I make that I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to the bill if the question is to be put on the amendment, because we have not a quorum now, and we are liable not to have one this evening, or I would let the Senator have a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that the Senate has granted the consideration of the bill. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, let us have a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall ask for the yeas and nays if such a course becomes necessary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to say one word before we come to a vote on the amendment. The committee had the bill under consideration and treated the widow of Gen. Bragg just the same as they have been treating the widows of other generals. They allowed her the greatest amount that the committee allows to any, and it seems to me that her case ought not to be taken without the general rule. We gave her the maximum amount that the committee has ever given to anyone, except in one instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. I move to amend the bill by inserting the word "seventy-five" in lieu of "fifty," before the word "dollars."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, before the word "dollars," strike out the word "fifty" and insert "seventy-five."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to this bill. I have called up House bill 25598, granting a pension to Mrs. Bragg. I asked to have the amount increased from $50 to $100, and that was voted down. It is now before the Senate on my proposed amendment of $75 a month.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I sincerely trust the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio may prevail. Years ago, when I was almost a boy, it was my lot to serve in the legislature of the State of Wisconsin with Gen. Bragg. I became acquainted with him away back in 1868 and 1869. He was then a member of the State senate and I was a member of the assembly. He was universally known in those days, and has been known ever since, as a very able lawyer, as one of the best legislators we had in the State, as a fearless and independent man; but whatever other faculties and powers he had, he never succeeded in accumulating much of this world's goods. When the war came on he joined the Army in one of our Wisconsin regiments. He finally became a brigadier general and commander of the noted Iron Brigade. After the war he returned to his State and resumed the practice of his profession; but with all his skill and with all his ability he never, as I have said, succeeded in accumulating a fortune, and he died a poor man.

While Gen. Bragg belonged to a different party from the party of which I have been a member, I have always felt that he was one of the noblest and most patriotic of American citizens. He died leaving his widow with nothing at all; she has no resources at her command. I think this great country of ours ought to be generous to the widow of the commander of the great Iron Brigade. I sincerely trust the Senate will accord her a pension of at least $100 a month.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Minnesota will realize that the widows of hundreds of generals of equal fidelity and character in America with Gen. Bragg did not have the fortune of having their husbands in the legislature of which the Senator from Minnesota was a member, and I hope the Senator will not take advantage of that fact to allow it to weigh against the rights of hundreds of other widows to whom we have only granted $50 a month and who would have the same claim to a greater amount as has the widow of Gen. Bragg. I am simply pleading for equality of treatment of those whose conditions are the same. If the Senator would look over the large number of cases in which we have granted special pensions in the last 10 years he will find that the maximum amount granted was $50. He ought not to take one case and make an exception of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want, in reply to the Senator, to call his attention to the fact that while it may be true that, as a general rule, we have only allowed such widows $50 a month, yet in most cases the allowance has been to widows whose husbands had left them something of an estate. In the case of Gen. Bragg he practically left nothing at all, and his widow has no means or resources of her own whatsoever. More than that, she is an invalid, in very poor health; she is helpless, and practically has to have a nurse to attend on and wait upon her. She can live but a few years. In view of her condition I submit that in the case of the widow of the commander of the great Iron Brigade we ought to deal liberally and to make an exception in her favor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment striking out "fifty" and inserting "seventy-five."

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act granting a pension to Cornelia C. Bragg."

IMPORTATION AND TRANSPORTATION OF NURSERY STOCK.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4468.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4468) to regulate the importation and interstate transportation of nursery stock; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint a Federal horticultural commission, and to define the powers of this commission in establishing and maintaining quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests; to permit and regulate the movement of fruits, plants, and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is that the bill which was read the other day?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the bill, Mr. President, which was read the other day. I will say, however, that it was recommitted to the committee and the language to which the Senator from Utah objected has been eliminated from the bill. Section 10 was the portion of the bill to which the Senator objected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not like to object to the consideration of the bill, but I should like to examine it before it is passed upon. For that reason I feel impelled to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

THEODORE SALUS.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 13938, which is a personal-injury case, in which a man's sight was entirely destroyed—a very deserving case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 13938) for the relief of Theodore Salus.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Theodore Salus $3,000 for the loss of his eyes and other physical injuries received by him in an explosion at Agana, island of Guam, on February 12, 1906, while he was in the employ of the Government of the United States and in the discharge of his duties as a foreman of labor at the town of Agana, Island of Guam.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM WALTERS, ALIAS JOSHUA BROWN.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1562) for the relief of William Walters, alias Joshua Brown.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That in the administration of the pension laws William Walters, alias Joshua Brown, who was a private of Battery M, First Regiment United States Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said battery and regiment on the 13th day of September, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET M'QUADE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6408) for the relief of Margaret McQuade.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$840," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Margaret McQuade, widow of the late Edward McQuade, alias Edward Quade, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $840 as compensation for the death of the said Edward McQuade, alias Edward Quade, caused by and in the performance of his duties as an employee in the Government service in the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERSTATE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases.

Mr. PENROSE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

MEMORIAL AMPHITHEATER AT ARLINGTON.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4780) for the erection of a memorial amphitheater at Arlington Cemetery.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say, Mr. President, that the bill has already been read and certain amendments have been agreed to. There is an amendment now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, after the word "amphitheater," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "including a chapel."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUDITOR OF RAILROAD ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5556) to amend "An act to create an Auditor of Railroad Accounts, and for other purposes," approved June 19, 1878, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1881, and March 3, 1903, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment on page 2, line 11, before the word "upon," to strike out "devolve" and insert "devolved," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the duties devolved on the Secretary of the Interior by the act of Congress approved June 19, 1878 (20 Stats., p. 169), entitled "An act to create an Auditor of Railroad Accounts, and for other purposes," as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887 (21 Stats., p. 409), entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes," as amended by the act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stats., p. 1119), entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes," be, and they hereby are, transferred to and devolved upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as objecting to the consideration of the bill, but I really would like whoever has it in charge to indicate the nature of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will be very glad to do so. The reasons for the bill appear in the report, in which there is printed a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, to whom the bill was referred, stating that the section it is proposed to repeal is no longer necessary, because the same duties are required of the Interstate Commerce Commission in connection with railroad reports. The Secretary thinks the section of the statutes covered by the bill is no longer useful, and there is no appropriation for carrying it out. It has been a dead letter for years.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the report of the committee may be printed in the RECORD to accompany the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The report submitted by Mr. BRANDEGEE on May 30, 1912, is as follows:

The Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which the foregoing bill was referred, having examined the same, recommends that the bill do pass.

By act of June 19, 1878, railroads were compelled to file with the Secretary of the Interior once a year a statement showing the conditions of their companies, but after the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission these reports became a mere matter of form, and the Secretary of the Interior is of the opinion that they should be made to the Interstate Commerce Commission. A letter of the Secretary of the Interior of date May 13, 1912, is attached and made a part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 13, 1912.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP,
Chairman Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate.

SIR: By your reference of May 8, 1912, the department is in receipt, for a report, of S. 5556, entitled:

"'An act to create an auditor of railroad accounts, and for other purposes,' approved June 19, 1878, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1881, and March 3, 1903, and for other purposes."

By the act of June 19, 1878 (20 Stats., 169), the office of auditor of railroad accounts was established in this department. The title of the position was subsequently changed to commissioner of railroads, and by the act of March 3, 1903, the office of commissioner of railroads was abolished, and the duties required by the act of June 19, 1878, devolved on the Secretary of the Interior. The only duty now performed under the last-mentioned act is to require that the railroad companies coming within its purview file with the department on the 1st day of November in each year a report on the "condition of each of said railroad companies, their road, accounts, and affairs for the fiscal year ending June 30 immediately preceding," as Congress has not, since abolishing the office of commissioner of railroads, made an appropriation to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect certain other provisions of the act, and the present clerical force of the Secretary's office is not sufficient, in addition to its other duties, to perform the work. A report to a great extent identical with the one required to be made to the department is now made by each railroad coming under the provisions of the act of 1878 to the Interstate Commerce Commission, thus resulting in a duplication of work.

Under the circumstances, and considering the department has no facilities for fully carrying into effect the act of 1878, while the Interstate Commerce Commission has, it is believed that S. 5556 should be enacted into law, and I so recommend.

Very respectfully,

WALTER L. FISHER, Secretary.

IMPORTS FOR EXHIBITION PURPOSES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 7339) to provide for the entry under bond of exhibits of arts, sciences, and industries, to report it without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at expositions of the arts, sciences, and industries and products of the soil, mine, and sea, to be held in expositions to be held by the Merchants and Manufacturers' Exchange of New York, in the buildings in the city of New York owned or controlled by the Merchants and Manufacturers' Exchange, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty, shall be admitted free of the payment of such duty, customs, fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but that it shall be lawful at any time during the exposition to sell, for delivery at the close thereof, any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and provides that all such articles, when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States, shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal; and that on articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and necessary exposure the duty, if paid, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal for consumption or use; and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WESTON, W. VA.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6341) to provide for the erection of a public building at Weston, W. Va.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 9, after the word "exceed," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults and heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office, in the town of Weston, W. Va., the cost of the same not to exceed $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on May 14 I introduced Senate bill 6810, which I had intended to offer as a substitute for the bill (S. 957) relating to bills of lading, which is now on the calendar. Since that date there have been several amendments or changes deemed advisable, and I now ask to have that bill reprinted with those amendments and that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it is now so late that I will not ask for the regular order; but I want to put into the RECORD a statement I made the other day concerning the sovereignty of this country on the Canal Zone, which was incorporated in the midst of the speech of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I ask unanimous consent that that may be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the other day in touching incidentally upon this question of the sovereignty of the United States in the Canal Zone, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and I had a colloquy. I told the Senator that I would put into the RECORD, as soon as I could find it, the utterance of President Taft in connection with that matter. I take occasion now to read very briefly from the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate under date of April 18, 1906, from the statement of the Hon. William H. Taft, then Secretary of War. At page 2526 of said hearings, he states:

"Article 3 of the treaty provides as follows:

"'The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.'"

Then he continues:

"It is peculiar in not conferring sovereignty directly upon the United States, but in giving to the United States the powers which it would have if it were sovereign."

He italicizes the words "if it were sovereign."

"This gives rise to the obvious implication that a mere titular sovereignty is reserved in the Panama Government. Now, I agree that to the Anglo-Saxon mind a titular sovereignty is like what Gov. Allen, of Ohio, once characterized as a 'barren ideality,' but to the Spanish or Latin mind, poetic and sentimental, enjoying the intellectual refinements and dwelling much on names and forms, it is by no means unimportant. Therefore, when the question of the form of stamp was to be determined I had not the slightest hesitation in yielding to the view that we should adopt the system which for a time Gen. Davis had himself adopted before he got United States stamps of merely purchasing the Panama stamps and crossing them with the words 'Canal Zone.' I do not know that it is necessary for me to go through the various provisions of the order of December 3. I have discussed them at length in my letter transmitting the annual report of the commission for 1904, and it is printed on pages 2392 to 2410 of this record.

"The order, in effect, required that all importations into the Isthmus of merchandise, except those admitted free of duty for the Government of the United States or its employees under the treaty, should be entered at the Panama ports instead of at the United States ports in order that the Panamans might collect duty on them and thus maintain their revenues. This, however, was on condition that they should reduce their duties from 15 per cent ad valorem to 10 per cent ad valorem. I deemed it of great importance that the Panama Republic should be self-supporting. Free trade between the zone and the Republic was declared. The existence of the terminal ports of the canal as ports of the United States for clearing and entering by foreign vessels was recognized. Without waiting to determine whether the Government of Panama would fail in its duty to enforce the sanitary ordinances in Panama and Colon prescribed by the United States, as was probable, the Republic turned over to the United States authorities immediate right to enforce the same. The postal rate from Panama to the United States and from the United States to Panama was made 2 cents, the stamp in the zone being the Panaman stamp crossed with the words 'Canal Zone.'"

That is put in to fulfill my promise to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement of the Commissioner of Navigation concerning the receipts of the Suez Canal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

MARY E. QUINN.

Mr. PENROSE obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PENROSE. I rose to make a motion to adjourn, but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] informs me that he desires an executive session, and I will therefore withhold the motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will withhold the motion to accommodate the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, there is one more bill, involving a claim for personal injury, which will only take a moment to consider. It is a very deserving case, and I should like to have it considered. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 644) for the relief of Mary E. Quinn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Mary E. Quinn, whose husband, James H. Quinn, was fatally injured by an accident at the Watertown Arsenal, Watertown, Mass., $1,500.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that when the Senate adjourns today it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 25, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 24, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou to whom we are responsible for every act, quicken, we beseech Thee, our conscience and clarify our spiritual vision, that we may make straight our paths by the absolute truth of our speech and the rectitude of our behavior, that peace and righteousness may possess our souls now and always. In the spirit of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 4012. An act to authorize the exchange of certain lands with the State of Michigan.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 7027. An act to prohibit the importation and the interstate transportation of films or other pictorial representations of prize fights, and for other purposes; and

S. 4948. An act relating to inherited estates in the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

ASSISTANCE AND SALVAGE AT SEA.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 23111) to carry into effect provisions of an international convention for the unification of certain rules with respect to assistance and salvage at sea, and to take up a similar Senate bill, S. 4930, from the Speaker's table and to consider and pass the same. I do not think there is any objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some idea of how long it would take to dispose of the proposition presented by the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SULZER. It will take only a couple of minutes.

Mr. KENDALL. It will not be a contested matter.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I will say that there is no objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri so far as the Committee on Foreign Affairs is concerned. The House bill was considered by that committee and was to be reported favorably, but was held in the committee pending advices from the Belgian Government through the State Department. We now have advices that ratifications of the treaty have been deposited with the Belgian Government, and hence this bill should be passed at the earliest possible moment. It is a meritorious measure. There can be no substantial objection to its present consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire why the great hurry for passing this on Calendar Wednesday. It seems to me that we ought not to mutilate Calendar Wednesday too much.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make this statement on his own account: Ordinarily he would not permit any business of this kind or any other kind to come up and crowd out Calendar Wednesday, even for five minutes; but we are reaching the end of the session—that is, we hope so [applause]—and these matters which are easy to dispose of in short order, it seems to the Chair, should be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would inquire of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], what the great hurry to pass this bill this morning is?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, there is no great hurry to pass the bill this morning, except that at this late date in the session it is important that this legislation should be enacted into law. I consulted the gentlemen who have the call to-day, and they said if it did not take more than a few minutes they would not object. I am not trying to obstruct the business of Calendar Wednesday and simply wish to get the bill through if possible, because it is one of great importance and has been pending for some time. The bill has already passed the Senate and is on the Speaker's table. It will not take more than a minute to pass it.

Mr. KENDALL. A similar bill was favorably considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; favorably considered, two months ago.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But, Mr. Speaker, we would like to know something about the time the bill will take.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think it will take five minutes, unless some one wants to discuss it. If it takes too much time, I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. SULZER. No one, so far as I know, wants to discuss it. It will take only a minute to pass it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand it the request is to take the Senate bill from the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I think the bill should be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4930) to harmonize the national law of salvage with the provisions of the international convention for the unification of certain rules with respect to assistance and salvage at sea, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the right to remuneration for assistance or salvage services shall not be affected by common ownership of the vessels rendering and receiving such assistance or salvage services.

SEC. 2. That the master or person in charge of a vessel shall, so far as he can do so without serious danger to his own vessel, crew, or passengers, render assistance to every person who is found at sea in danger of being lost; and if he fails to do so, he shall, upon conviction, be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or both.

SEC. 3. That salvors of human life, who have taken part in the services rendered on the occasion of the accident giving rise to salvage, are entitled to a fair share of the remuneration awarded to the salvors of the vessel, her cargo, and accessories.

SEC. 4. That a suit for the recovery of remuneration for rendering assistance or salvage services shall not be maintainable if brought later than two years from the date when such assistance or salvage was rendered, unless the court in which the suit is brought shall be satisfied that during such period there had not been any reasonable opportunity of arresting the assisted or salved vessel within the jurisdiction of the court or within the territorial waters of the country in which the libelant resides or has his principal place of business.

SEC. 5. That nothing in this act shall be construed as applying to ships of war or to Government ships appropriated exclusively to a public service.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after July 1, 1912.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, I understand from the gentleman that this bill is to carry out the terms of an international conference and that it meets the approval of the State Department and also of the Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will again report the bill by title.

The Clerk again reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Missouri is to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from further consideration of the House bill H. R. 23111 and to take up the bill S. 4930 and consider the same. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The bill H. R. 23111 was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD in connection with this matter a letter from the Secretary of State and advices from the Belgian Government.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The letter and advices are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 17, 1912.

The Hon. WILLIAM SULZER,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to the department's letter of the 17th ultimo, in regard to the bill H. R. 23111, now under consideration by your committee, "To carry into effect the provisions of a convention for the unification of certain rules with respect to assistance and salvage at sea," I have the honor to inclose for your information in connection with the matter a translation of a note from the Belgian minister at this capital.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
P. C. KNOX.

(Inclosure: from Belgian minister, July 6, 1912.)

(Translation.)

LEGATION OF BELGIUM,
Washington, July 6, 1912.

His Excellency the Hon. PHILANDER CHASE KNOX,
Secretary of State, at Washington.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: The international conventions with respect to collisions and to assistance and salvage at sea which were signed at Brussels, September 23, 1912, contain in articles 16 and 18, respectively, the following provisions as to their ratification and going into effect:

"The present convention shall be ratified.

"At the expiration of the term of one year at the latest from the date of the signature of the convention the Belgian Government will enter into communication with such Governments of the high contracting parties as shall have declared their readiness to ratify it, to the end of coming to a decision as to whether it is proper to put it into force.

"The ratifications will, the case arising, be immediately deposited at Brussels, and the convention will go into effect one month thereafter.

"The protocol will remain opened for another year to the States represented at the Brussels conference. After that period they could but adhere in accordance with the provisions of article 15 (17)."

As is known, the reason why the formality of ratification was deferred is that in many of the signatory countries the conventions could not receive legislative sanction in good time.

It appears from the information in the hands of the King's Government that a certain number of powers are now in position to ratify the conventions.

They are Germany, Belgium, the United States of America (as regards the convention relative to salvage, the collision conventions not having yet secured legislative approval), Great Britain (His Britannic Majesty's Government would at the same time adhere for British India, the Crown colonies and protectorates possessing sea coasts, Cyprus, and the South African Union), Greece, Mexico, Roumania, and Russia.

Several of these countries have even expressed a desire to be allowed to deposit their ratifications at this time.

It would thus seem that the time has come to take up the question of putting the conventions into force. The King's Government believes it may suggest the date of October 1 next to that effect. The ratifications should then, under the provisions quoted above, be deposited one month earlier; the protocol of deposit of ratifications would bear date September 1, 1912.

According to the information obtained by the King's Government it seems certain that countries other than those above named, France notably, will be in a position to ratify the conventions before September 1. In any event, in accordance with the provisions above referred to, the protocol will remain open for one year to the signatory powers which could not ratify on that date.

The King's Government indulges the hope that the dates above indicated will meet with the approval of the American Government, and that it will be able, on the 1st day of September next, to ratify not only the salvage convention, but also that dealing with collisions.

I have been instructed by my Government to forward this communication to your excellency.

I embrace this opportunity, Mr. Secretary of State, to offer to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

E. HAVENITH.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 20728) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and ask unanimous consent to disagree to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a conference thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Indian appropriation bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20728) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it will take an hour or more to report the amendments, which I do not think will be necessary. I will say to the gentleman when that is done I desire to occupy a little time on the subject, and I think the gentleman would not desire to have that done to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

BILLS ON THE UNANIMOUS-CONSENT CALENDAR.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a week ago last Monday, unanimous-consent day, the Unanimous Consent Calendar was not finished. There are five Mondays in this month. There are still bills pending on that calendar—a very large calendar—and I ask unanimous consent that on next Monday, which is the fifth Monday in the month, that business which is in order on unanimous-consent day, suspension day, may be in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that business which is in order on the first and third Mondays—unanimous consent, suspension of the rules, discharge of the committees—shall be in order next Monday, which is the fifth Monday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The call of the House rests with the Committee on Labor, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 18787. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of that bill, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] will take the chair.

LIMITATION OF HOURS OF EMPLOYEES ON PUBLIC WORKS.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18787, with Mr. PAGE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the purposes of this bill are similar to other eight-hour bills which have been considered by the Congress from time to time, I believe, since 1868. This particular bill has been made necessary due to a decision rendered by the Supreme Court defining dredge workers as seamen, and therefore claiming that the eight-hour bill enacted in 1892 did not apply, and in regard to that I want to read to the committee extracts from the dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Moody, as follows:

I am unable to agree with the opinion of the court so far as it relates to the employment for more than eight hours a day of men engaged in work on the dredges and scows. * * *

The first question is whether the men named in the information were employed by the defendants "upon any of the public works of the United States" within the meaning of those words as Congress used them. * * * The dredging of channels in our waterways is not mere digging. It has for its purpose the creation of something with as visible a form as a cellar to a house, etc. Surely all these are works, and, if constructed by the Government, "public works." * * * For example, the appropriation for one of these works in question in these cases is in the following terms: "The following sums of money * * * are hereby appropriated * * * for the construction * * * of the public works hereinafter named. * * * For improving said harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 119, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, by providing channels 35 feet deep, * * * $600,000." That is to say, at the very threshold of the inquiry we find that the Congress which had forbidden a longer day's work than 8 hours upon "the public works of the United States" had, upon undertaking this very work, deliberately called it a "public work."

The cogency of the argument arising from the use of the same words in the eight-hour law as in the appropriation law can not be met by the suggestion that it is easy to read the words in the eight-hour law in a narrower sense than they were used in the appropriation law. The question here is not how the words may be interpreted, but how they ought to be interpreted. There is no necessity to explore the possibilities of escape from the intention which Congress has made sufficiently plain. * * *

The second question is whether the men named in the information were laborers or mechanics. * * * The men who were employed upon the dredges were not seamen, in respect of the work they were actually doing. The master and engineer of the dredge were not licensed, and the men employed upon it seemed not to have entered into any contract of shipment. * * * All those who were engaged in the work may be described as either laborers or mechanics. They had nothing whatever to do with navigation. They were towed to the place where the work was to be done and there left to do it.

It does not seem to be important that for some purposes the scows and dredges were vessels, or those employed upon them for some purposes are deemed seamen. The question here is what were the men when they were engaged in the work of excavation? Were the men at that time employed as seamen, doing the work of seamen, or as laborers and mechanics, doing the work of laborers and mechanics? I think they then were laborers and mechanics, and employed as such, and that their occupation is determined not by what they have been in the past, or by what their employers chose to call them, but by what they were doing when the Government invoked the law for their benefit. * * * Nor was their work in dredging incident to their employment on the dredges, but quite the reverse. They never would have been employed at all except for dredging. They never would have set foot on the dredge save to use it as a platform on which to do the work of laborers and mechanics. * * * They were employed to do the work of laborers and mechanics; in the main they actually did that work, and whatever they did which was of the nature of seamen's work was a mere incident to the fact that they labored upon a floating platform instead of upon the dry land. * * * When the intention of the legislature is reasonably clear, the courts have no duty except to carry it out. The rule for the construction of penal statutes is satisfied if the words are not enlarged beyond their natural meaning, and it does not require that they shall be restricted to less than that.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Day concur in this dissent.

I probably should have stated first, Mr. Chairman, that this decision was rendered, I think, in about 1906, some years after this law had been passed, and was supposed to cover work of this nature; and, I think, about 1906 there were prosecutions started against those who had violated this law, and they were convicted and penalized, and this decision was the result of an appeal to the Supreme Court; and it is very evident that judges who render decisions of this character do it because they are rendering these decisions as they think the law ought to be, not as the law reads. There has never been a time before that dredge workers were classed as seamen, and it is apparent—to me at least— that they were called seamen at that time by the employers and by the judges for the purpose of blocking the efforts of Congress to reduce the hours of those engaged in this labor from 12 to 8. Now, for the information of the Members here present I want to say it is not my purpose to take up much time—I do not believe it is necessary, because I think the matter is generally understood—but I would like, however, to give some statements which were made by the secretary and treasurer of the steam shovel and dredgemen's organization, Mr. Thomas J. Dolan, who I believe is a man who has the confidence of the employers as well as the employees; and he states that he and his associates represented about 100,000 men, not claiming that they are all working at the class of work that this bill will cover, due to the fact it is difficult to organize that class of men.

In answer to the questions that were asked Mr. Dolan as to improvements in this kind of work, he stated before the committee in the hearings that the efficiency of the men has been increased more than 100 per cent; in other words, that the workmen to-day are doing more than double the amount of work which they did some 15 or 20 years ago, and that it seems to be largely due to the fact that through organization they are able to secure better conditions, and, therefore, the workmen are more efficient.

Also, Mr. Martin Cole, representing the Licensed Tugmen's Protective Association, has stated that the increased productive powers, due to the new methods of production in this industry and efficiency of workmen together, has increased from 1,000 to 1,500 yards daily to 6,000 to 7,000 yards daily. In other words, the new equipments of to-day, with the improved efficiency of the workmen, have increased the productive power of work of this nature from 1,000 to 1,500 yards a day to 6,000 to 7,000 yards a day. It does seem to me that the men who are a part of this industry are entitled to some of the benefits of this increased production in the way of reduction of hours, even though it might reduce their productive capacity to a small extent.

I do not feel that it is necessary for me to take any further time of the House in regard to this matter, and I will close by saying that in this age there is certainly not anyone who desires to oppose the reduction of hours, and especially in cases where it is shown they are working from 12 to 14 hours, and no objections to this bill which provides for putting the work under the eight-hour system, as we have done with other work for which the Government contracts. And it can be done, in my judgment, without a great hardship upon the contractors who are employing these workmen.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not, if this bill becomes a law, the levee work provided for by the bill which was passed several days ago, and which was declared under the terms of that bill to be "extraordinary emergency work" would be excluded from the terms of the eight-hour law?

Mr. BUCHANAN. This exempts extraordinary emergency work. At the bottom of page 2 it reads:

Except in cases of extraordinary emergency.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Then, do I understand you to say that in your judgment the words which I show you here in the river and harbor act, on page 48 of the bill, as presented to the House, reading, "which shall be considered extraordinary emergency work," would be considered as exempting this work from the terms of your bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to say, unless it is extraordinary emergency work, I would not want it excluded. If this work becomes extraordinary emergency work, due to the fact that there shall be a loss of property or life, then this provision in the bill excludes it. I do not know why it is defined as "extraordinary emergency work." Possibly it was because a property loss would result unless this was done as emergency work, and it has to be expedited as fast as possible. I do not know of any other reason why Congress would put such a provision in the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. That is true beyond question. I was simply asking the gentleman what his construction of the use of these words would be, as to exempting the levee work from the terms of your bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will say, so far as I can see the words are the same, unless the work has been wrongly defined, and unless the work has been wrongly defined I suppose it would exclude it, in my opinion, as long as you have it in that paragraph.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I notice on line 12, page 2, of the bill these words are used:

Which eight hours shall terminate within nine hours from the beginning of workday.

Now, under the strict construction of those words I would like to ask you how many shifts will be required to take care of the operation of locks on rivers or canals where boats are required to pass through during all portions of the night and day.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not believe I understood the question.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. To repeat my question: Under the terms of this bill, which reads, "Which eight hours shall terminate within nine hours from the beginning of workday," suppose we have a case of a lock on some river where perhaps there are not more than 8 or 10 boats passing during the day—in other words, not more than 8 or 10 lockages during the day. The lock keeper lives in a house adjacent to the lock, and yet he can not serve for more than nine hours from the time he begins work, when he must quit his duty. Would not that require, in the case I have stated, three shifts of men to take care of that lock?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think it would.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. And do you not think that might be made an exception from the general terms of the bill? I wish to say to the gentleman that I am heartily in accord with the general terms of his bill, but I ask him if he does not think in that case there might be an exception?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, there are probably cases it would be reasonable to define as exceptions; but I find that where you make exceptions in matters of this kind they are always abused, and one of the reasons why we made this provision which you speak of in the bill is because the representatives of the tug workers complained that their work had been strung out over, we will say, 16 hours a day. Possibly while not actual work for that length of time, it was, of course, the same, because they had to spend the time there on the job. It was to prevent the abuses they complained of in regard to that that we put the provision in there. There may be circumstances that would appeal to one as being exceptions to the rule. Now, we have our police forces, for instance, and clerks often that do not have any hard work to do and their work is not continuous. Still it is generally considered that about eight hours are sufficient for workmen of any kind, whether the work is mental or otherwise, in order that the workmen should be most efficient to do the work.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Now, in regard to cooks and waiters, for instance, on the tugs and dredge boats. I assume that they have to get up pretty early in the morning and get the breakfast ready an hour or two, at any rate, before the crew would begin work. They certainly must have a good deal of rest time during the day, and unless you would except them from the terms of this bill you would have to have two sets of cooks and two sets of waiters, would you not? I am simply calling this matter to the gentleman's attention, so that he may present an amendment which would accommodate the bill to the purposes for which it was drawn and yet not work great hardships in some of these isolated cases.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not familiar with the work of cooks and waiters on the boats. I suppose, though, in cases where they work three shifts, their hours should be shortened in some manner or other. I am not prepared to answer whether it is proper to shorten the time of cooks or not. I am not prepared to answer that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the class just mentioned by the gentleman from Louisiana, I would like to suggest another, such, for instance, as master's mates and the like of dredge boats, who in many instances must necessarily be on duty more than eight hours at a time, nor do I understand they wish to come under the 8-hour law. Now, this 8-hour provision, as I see it, might be very readily applied to operators of dredging machinery who live on shore, as many do, simply going on board of a dredge during the day, but hardly to those working irregularly or to master's mates, crews of vessels, and the like. Its application to them, it seems to me, might in many instances result in the smallest amount of labor for the daily wage and often in the doubling and trebling of the number of employees doing a given kind of work. To require the contractors to have two or three shifts during the 24 hours might be putting an unnecessary hardship on the Government, without any compensating benefit to the laboring classes or to the people at large.

I want to say right here, as was said by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], that I am thoroughly in sympathy with this class of legislation, and sincerely believe in the application of the 8-hour law to laborers and mechanics, in short, to nearly all classes of steady workers. But where a person works irregularly or intermittently, I doubt if he should be subjected to a provision such as the 9-hour provision in lines 12 and 13 of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That bears out what I said a moment ago. The minute you start to make exceptions there is always somebody who will want to make the exceptions general. The fact is that eight hours' work is sufficient for any man per day, whether he is at actual hard labor or not, because, taking in the time that he uses in getting to and from his work, a man is usually required to spend 10 hours of his time in performing eight hours' work. The workman who usually works eight hours is away from home generally 10 hours, because it usually takes him an hour to get to his work and get ready, and also an hour to get away, and so forth. The minute you start to talk about exceptions, it seems, the next you know is that you have got them generally applying to everything.

Now, the conditions that are maintained at this time on certain kinds of dredge work are such that, in my opinion, the lives of the men working thereon are a blank, so far as concerns their having any intercourse or association with any sort of society, except with those who work with them. In some cases they go out and work for a week or for a month on a single trip. In olden times, I believe, it was stated that they stayed out for a month at a time, and when they did get back to civilization, as was said by one of the witnesses who was before the committee, they tried to take in everything in about half a day or so, and that condition tends to degenerate the human kind.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not criticizing the general purposes of the bill. I will say to the gentleman I favor its passage.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, the same argument has been made at all times when you have tried to secure a reduction of hours. Now, I am not stating that the gentleman who makes the inquiry looks at it from that point of view, but it seems to me that not only in the recent past, but for ages, anything that may interfere with profit has been looked upon with disfavor, and the dollar has stood above the man. In the consideration of these measures one reason why we have made such slow progress in our battle for shorter hours in this country and in Europe for the last 100 years is the fact and the argument that there is danger of interfering with the profit of the manufacturer or the employer. It is true that the reduction of hours, as has been shown time and time again, has brought about an improvement to the workman and an increase of his efficiency, and probably in the run of years has produced no loss to the manufacturer or employer; and yet that argument has borne and still bears most heavily against us. However, we are getting away from that to a certain extent, as I hope and believe, and I believe that the gentleman himself has gotten away from it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I understand thoroughly and am in sympathy with the intention of the bill, but, in my opinion, exceptions ought to be made. You can not make a law applicable to all conditions. Exceptional conditions arise, and they should be taken into consideration when we legislate.

But here is what I want to ask of the gentleman: I understand, of course, that we should not always take into account the matter of expense, but has the gentleman considered how great the additional expense would be to the Government in the matter of river and harbor work if the bill passes in its present shape?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, judging from past experiences in regard to the reduction of hours in other industries, I think the expense will not be great. I will say, however, that if it were I would still be in favor of the bill just the same, because I believe in putting humanity above the matter of dollars. But in my judgment, based on past experience, the additional expense to be incurred would not be great.

I want to call my friend's attention to the difficulty of making provisions such as the gentleman is speaking of. This law, for instance, has been made necessary in order to protect certain workers, because of the fact that employers have continually tried to evade the law. The adoption of the eight-hour law in 1892 was made necessary owing to the fact that not only employers, but the department officials, were endeavoring to evade the law, and there are decisions of judges the effect of which is to nullify the provisions of the law. I might read to you what President Grant had to say about the law of 1868. He issued a proclamation on May 19, 1869, for the purpose of checking abuses which were preventing the generous objects of the statute, by declaring that from and after that date no reduction should be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction in the hours.

He issued another proclamation on the same question in 1872. In order to evade the provision of this law the Department of Justice had held that the act of June 25, 1868, was not applicable to mechanics, workmen, and laborers in the employ of contractors with the United States; that the act was not intended to extend to any others than the immediate employees of the Government; and in United States against Martin the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision in respect to the eight-hour law of 1868 which practically destroyed that law and defeated the good intention of the legislators who enacted it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not wish to be understood as opposing the bill. I am in favor of it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am pointing out these things to the gentleman to show why it is practically impossible to include the provision to which he refers. If it is included, it will be applied to everything in the industry, as it has been applied, by the assistance of the Federal judges.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not know that it is true, but I am informed by what I consider competent authority that this provision will add to the cost of river and harbor work perhaps 50 per cent. I refer more particularly to the language in lines 12 and 13, page 2:

> Which eight hours shall terminate within nine hours from beginning of workday.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Such a statement is erroneous.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not know how much the cost would be increased, but I know it would be very greatly increased.

I notice there is a difference made in here between the contractor or subcontractor on work other than river and harbor work done by the Government or its contractors and on river and harbor work. Perhaps I can best show what I mean by quoting the first part of section 1:

> SECTION 1. That the service and employment of all laborers and mechanics who are now or may hereafter be employed by the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia, or by any contractor or subcontractor, upon a public work of the United States or of the District of Columbia.

That refers to work other than river and harbor work, while the provision in regard to rivers and harbors seems to be much broader.

Why is this distinction made in river and harbor work and all other classes of Government work?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am of the opinion that this is similar to the other eight-hour measures. I do not think there is much difference. The intention is the same. The arbitrary decision of judges, who apparently have seen things through the eyes of the employer for profit instead of taking the humane side of the question, have made it necessary in drawing many bills to make the language broader, or else the language will be defined as meaning something else than what those who enacted the law intended. If it is any broader, that is probably the reason for it.

Mr. BATHRICK. May I ask a question? The statement has been made, has it not, that this bill would increase the cost 50 per cent?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have known from the engineer's department that it will probably reach that figure, at least 50 per cent, and one of them put it much higher than that.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that on all the hearings upon the subject of the reduction of the hours of labor of workmen employed upon Government contract work to eight hours, it has been demonstrated and stated by the contractors themselves that the difference in cost would not exceed in the neighborhood of 10 per cent, and I can not understand how this reduction of hours would exceed 10 per cent. I can not understand upon what basis anybody should make the statement that it would increase the cost 50 per cent.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Such a statement is erroneous.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that that has been the argument of all of the opponents of the eight-hour bills or bills for the reduction of hours of any kind for the last 100 years. In England in 1802 when they cut down the hours of apprentices to 72 a week the manufacturers there said that it was going to put them out of business. The same argument has been made from that time to this not only in this country but in the European countries by the employers of the country that the excessive cost would make it impossible to comply with it. That is an erroneous argument, and it does not have much weight with me, although I am always glad to listen to any side of a question. It is not my purpose, and never has been, to obstruct the business of this country, but I claim that any law which tends to protect humanity not only does not obstruct business but that it adds to business and strengthens and improves it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with patience, and this is the first time that I have heard it stated that it has been estimated anywhere that it would increase the cost of production 50 per cent. Will the gentleman please inform me where that suggestion comes from?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] made the statement.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I made the suggestion that it had been stated to me that the enactment of this bill into law, as it now stands, would cost the Government anywhere from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent. One of the engineers placed it even higher than that. A statement made by the gentleman from Illinois a while ago would show that in one class of work it would likely increase the cost at least 200 per cent. He admitted that where there is only one set of men now needed in the opening or tending of locks, this bill would require three. In other words, three shifts. They would certainly increase the cost as much as 200 per cent anyway.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is now speaking of river and harbor work?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is what we were discussing; yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Has that been the subject of discussion between the gentleman from Florida and the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I am obliged for the information.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It has hardly been a discussion. It was more of a colloquy.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, how would it be possible to increase the cost by 50 per cent, the cost of dredging, if the labor were increased only about 20 per cent and increased efficiency would flow from shorter hours?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state the ridiculous position in which the Government has been in regard to this eight-hour-a-day matter, and I want to read a part of the hearings to bear out what I say. Mr. W. B. Jones, the general president of the International Dredge Workers' Protective Association, was before the committee, and he said:

Mr. JONES. There has been a great deal of dredging done; take, for instance, the cities of Cleveland and Buffalo.

Mr. MAHER. Did they have regulations providing the eight-hour day?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; eight-hour day. For illustration, we will take the city of Buffalo, and they did some dredging in the rivers there for the State, in connection with the channel that is going through; the men on this dredging work for the State of New York and the city of Buffalo worked eight hours, on the canal, but the Government building the river or harbor part between the two ends of the canal in Niagara River, that work was let by the Government and that is all done at 12 hours.

Mr. MAHER. Practically all the dredge work is done by the Government, initiated by the State, Navy, or National Government.

Mr. JONES. Yes; some private work, but not to speak of, and the difference is men will be working in sight of one another, some working for the city or State and working eight hours, and others working under Government contract where you could almost throw a stone at one another, and working on the Government work 12 hours. That is, contract let by the Government.

In other words, the Government work was being done under a 12-hour day and the work for the State of New York and the city of Buffalo under an 8-hour day, practically in the same place, under the same conditions, the same structure, and the same canal or harbor. If any gentleman thinks that we should let a condition like that continue, I shall have to differ with him.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will ask the gentleman if his bill and this class of legislation will not have a tendency to create a monopoly in the hands of a few men who furnish material to the contractors in doing Government work? In other words, material must be purchased from men whose labor work is done under the eight-hour-a-day law. Take the South, for instance. Suppose there is a contract down there on some of the rivers for Government work or the construction of a building. How can a farmer or a millman who is working a few hands out in the forest and who is able to get the material and yet does not comply with the eight-hour-a-day law furnish any of that material to the Government?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to say to the gentleman that this has nothing to do with material itself. It is Government contract work for rivers and harbors.

Mr. TRIBBLE. But the same principle runs through all Government work, and the gentleman knows that the law forbids Government contractors from purchasing material from anyone who works labor over eight hours.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That may be, but I want to say in regard to the monopoly that it seems that we have already a monopoly in this work. The representative of the Employers' Association, Mr. William C. Ryan, who is a very nice gentleman, the secretary of the Dredge Owners' Protective Association, says that they are organized, and organized for the purpose of stopping the Government doing its own work evidently. That was one of the purposes. The Government had been doing its own work to such an extent that it was about to put the contractors out of business, so they have organized for that purpose and probably now have a monopoly. I am not prepared to state about that, but this will have nothing to do with a monopoly part of it anyway.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman seems to speak officially for the Government employees, and I will ask him to state to what extent this eight-hour-a-day law and the reduction of a day's labor is going to be carried in Government employees? You have come down in the number of hours from year to year. How many more will be required in the course of time? Will the gentleman state what the gentleman thinks ought to be a day's labor?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The requirements of humanity would satisfy me and nothing else.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What does the gentleman think ought to be a day's labor now?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, it is the general opinion at this time that eight hours is a fair day's work. I am not an authority on that question, however.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will ask the gentleman if he did not hear Mr. Carroll say in the Committee on Naval Affairs that there would soon be a movement when the men would demand seven and a half hours for Government employees, and does not the gentleman vouch for Mr. Carroll, and did not the gentleman bring Mr. Carroll there? Is not that true? I ask the gentleman if Mr. Carroll did not say a movement was on foot to reduce the hours to seven and a half? Now, will the gentleman answer me that question? Did he say that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not responsible for what Mr. Carroll says.

Mr. TRIBBLE. You vouch for him.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, that may be true that conditions may require that for humanity, but I wish to say when that question becomes an issue it is time enough to discuss the question.

Mr. TRIBBLE. It seems to me it is the issue now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to read for the benefit of some gentlemen here, and who do not seem to understand—I will ask the gentleman if he is opposed to an eight-hour day?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think that a Government employee has any more right to claim eight hours as a day's labor than the man who works upon the farm.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is not a question of Government employees.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I say that Government employees ought to work just as long as any other employees in this country. I do not propose to make any preference in regard to Government employees.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is not an answer to my question. I asked the gentleman whether he is in favor of the eight-hour day or a shorter working day.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I answered that question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. For the benefit of some gentlemen here I will read this, and then I will yield as soon as I do so. I have an extract here from what Mr. Carroll D. Wright, then Commissioner of Labor, wrote relative to the eight-hour law in the Fifty-fifth Congress. He says:

The policy of this class of legislation has therefore been settled by Congress, and I need not discuss this phase of the question. All such laws are enacted for the purpose of protecting the laboring man from the injurious consequences of prolonged physical effort, giving him more time for his personal affairs, and more time and energy to devote to the cultivation of his moral and mental powers. It has always been expected that they would aid him in the acquisition of knowledge, thus tending to make him a better and more contented citizen. This policy must be admitted by all to be a good one. The only difficulty is in so shaping legislation as not to interfere with necessary economic conditions. The Federal Government has long been committed to this policy; therefore the principle of the proposed bill may be considered as settled and approved.

Now, I want to read further what our martyred President McKinley said in the House of Representatives on August 28, 1890. He said:

And the Government of the United States ought, finally and in good faith, to set this example of eight hours as constituting a day's work required of laboring men in the service of the United States. The tendency of the times the world over is for shorter hours for labor—shorter hours in the interest of health, shorter hours in the interest of humanity, shorter hours in the interest of the home and the family—and the United States can do no better service to labor and to its own citizens than to set the example to States, to corporations, and to individuals employing men by declaring that, so far as the Government is concerned, eight hours shall constitute a day's work and be all that is required of its laboring force.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this bill should be passed. My colleague, Mr. Morey, has stated what we owe the family in this connection, and Cardinal Manning, in a recent article, spoke noble words on the general subject when he said:

"But if the domestic life of the people be vital above all; if the peace, the purity of homes, the education of children, the duties of wives and mothers, the duties of husbands and of fathers, be written in the natural law of mankind, and, if these things are sacred, far beyond anything that can be sold in the market, then I say if the hours of labor resulting from the unregulated sale of a man's strength and skill shall lead to the destruction of domestic life, to the neglect of children, to turning wives and mothers into living machines, and of fathers and husbands into—what shall I say, creatures of burden? I will not say any other word—who rise up before the sun and come back when it is set, wearied and able only to take food and lie down and rest, the domestic life of man exists no longer and we dare not go on in this path."

Mr. Speaker, we owe something to the care, the elevation, the dignity, and the education of labor. We owe something to the workingmen, and the families of the workingmen throughout the United States, who constitute the large body of our population, and this bill is a step in the right direction.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman answer me a question? The gentleman discussed labor in general and employees in general, and I want to ask the gentleman why he makes a distinction between Government employees and other labor. This provides for Government employees.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I make no distinction.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman does in his bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will say, for the gentleman's information, it is not my bill.

Mr. TRIBBLE. But you are advocating it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. WILSON] introduced the bill, and I undertook the work of reporting it to the House.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Why does not the gentleman offer an amendment putting all employees in the same category?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I now yield to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I may ask the gentleman some questions which have already been asked and answered, possibly, because it was impossible on this side to hear most of the questions which were asked and answered. As I understand it, the existing law applies only to laborers and mechanics, and that the courts have construed that it does not apply to men on dredges because, under the construction of the courts, they are seamen.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman states it correctly.

Mr. MANN. The purposes of this bill primarily is to cover these dredgers under the eight-hour law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman this question, if I may: In the case of dredges owned by the Government, men go on the dredge and live there. The same is true concerning dredges owned by contractors. I suppose somebody is in charge of the dredge. I do not know what the title would be—master or captain. Under the provisions of this bill as it stands now, would not every person on the dredge be limited to eight hours' work, not more than nine hours after the commencement of the working day?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Would it be possible to operate a dredge in that way?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, yes; I think so.

Mr. MANN. Now, the language of the bill is——

Mr. BUCHANAN. The fact is, I will say to my colleague, before this law was declared unconstitutional, or before it was declared that dredgemen were seamen, they were working on the eight-hour day——

Mr. MANN. I will say to my colleague that I am perfectly in accord with the desire of the bill, but——

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will say that I believe it is practicable.

Mr. MANN. The question is whether it is practicable that the man in charge of the dredge shall be confined to more than eight hours from the beginning of the workday, and that the cooks and anybody else connected with the dredge shall be confined in the same way?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to say that it is my personal opinion, though. Really I had not thought about the cooks and employees of that kind, and I never thought about this law applying to them. I do not consider the man who represents the company on any construction work an employee or workman in the sense that this bill was intended to apply, but he is an agent of the company, and in a different capacity from a workman.

Mr. MANN. I am asking these questions in the hope that we may arrive at some amendment to the bill which would make it workable, and therefore make it practicable to pass it and make it a law. The gentleman will notice that in the original act it says "laborers and mechanics." That, under the construction of the court, is not sufficient to cover the seamen. This bill says that all persons engaged in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor. And, I take it, that that means all persons who are paid out of an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I will say to my colleague that he has had a much wider experience than I have with these matters. In fact, I did not draft this bill myself.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But we want the bill to be practical. I will say that if there is any amendment that could be offered that would make it more workable, personally I would have no objection to it. I want to say that I am only one, and can not speak for anyone else.

Mr. MANN. I appreciate that. The gentleman knows, however, that, as a rule, one body of Congress may pass a bill which is not likely to pass the other body where there is something in the bill that is objectionable. I was wondering if there was not some description of these men that could be inserted instead of saying "all persons." "All persons" would probably include the United States Army engineers, and from them down to charwomen. It certainly would include the men in charge of the dredge. It certainly is not desirable to have three different men in charge of the dredge at different times as the only person in charge.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make with regard to the matter?

Mr. MANN. So far as covering "seamen" is concerned, so far as the decision of the court is concerned, it would be sufficient to provide for seamen engaged in river and harbor work, but I am not sure that that is sufficient as a matter of desirability. I have no objection to applying the eight-hour law wherever it can be applied.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The purpose of the bill is, of course, to make it apply to dredge work.

Mr. MANN. Although I could not hear all that was said, take the case that has already been alluded to as to locks. There are certain places where locks are maintained under the river and harbor work. Of course it is perfectly patent that the lock keeper who opens a lock a few times a day has little labor to perform at any time. And there is no reason for keeping three sets of lock keepers. I do not think anyone desires to have that done in the case I mentioned, if there is such a case.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I should think there ought to be some provision to make an exception for such cases, but it is difficult to do it. The purpose of the employers almost invariably is to endeavor to evade the purposes of the law. If it was not for that it would be easy to arrange those things. But the trouble with the eight-hour laws and all other laws for the benefit of labor has been that it is necessary to make them broad, because there has been a tendency on the part of the employer to evade them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] has expired.

Mr. MANN. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I can answer some further questions.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended, as I want to ask him some questions. I ask that his time be extended 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire to ask further questions?

Mr. MANN. Not at present.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I notice you asked the gentleman from Illinois if he had any suggestions. I have one which might obviate some of the trouble. If you will insert, on line 2, page 2, after the word "mechanics," "and all operators of dredging machinery who live on shore and go on board dredges or other water craft for the day," those words, it seems to me, would obviate the objection as to the owners of the boat, like captains or their representatives, and obviate the trouble about cooks and waiters and employees of that kind, and would accomplish your purpose of protecting those who are now classed under that decision as seamen.

Let me read it again in order that I may make it clear to you. After the words "laborers and mechanics," on line 2, page 2, add "and all operators of dredging machinery who live on shore and go on board dredges or other water craft for the day." Insert those words instead of using the words "all persons," and so forth, on line 6. I simply submit that for your consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The probability is that they would all be living on the vessels.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As a matter of fact, a great many of them live on shore.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, I believe they do, especially about the Lakes. I know they do, many of them. It certainly is not a pleasant life to lead on the water, and it seems to me that those who live on the water ought to have eight hours, if anyone else is entitled to it, and they ought to be given an opportunity to be on shore a little more than they are under present conditions.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It requires a good deal of time in some cases, I will say to the gentleman, to get these men from the shore to the places where they work, so that in some cases under this 9-hour clause, I am told, they would not actually work more than five or six hours a day. Perhaps, however, those are extreme cases.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think so. I think they are rare cases. From the knowledge I have of the work, I think those cases are exceptions to the rule.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I am in entire harmony with the purpose contained in the bill. I think that all laboring men ought to be included in the general provision restricting the hours of service to eight hours each day. I understand that the purpose of this bill is to include in the law which was passed a few years ago the men working on dredges engaged in river and harbor work. Am I right in this?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, will the gentleman please tell me why there is any necessity for including in the bill the language I find in italics as follows:

Which eight hours shall terminate in nine hours from beginning of workday.

I had in mind the idea that the hours of labor would always terminate within the time prescribed. The gentleman may have made the explanation, but we did not hear it on this side of the House. I am sorry to ask the gentleman to repeat it, but it needs repetition for the reason stated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That question was answered. One of the complaints made by the representatives of the men employed in this industry was that the time during which they did work was scattered out. It took them, for example, 16 hours sometimes to perform work representing 12 hours.

Mr. BUTLER. The hours of labor were not continuous, as I understand? They were divided or separated?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. That is a committee amendment that the gentleman has read—put in for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not understand the purpose of the committee amendment, because I did not appreciate the reason for it.

Now, let me ask the gentleman a further question, and then perhaps I will have the information I desire. At the bottom of page 2 are found these words—

Except in case of extraordinary emergency.

This bill imposes pretty heavy penalties. That would put the responsibility upon the employer of labor to determine whether or not the emergency was an extraordinary one, of course?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. In justice to him, could not that be simplified somewhat?

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is an amendment to the eight-hour law, which, I believe, provides for some one to define what the emergency is.

Mr. BUTLER. That I did not know.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is an amendment, I say, to the eight-hour law of 1892.

Mr. BUTLER. Then in that law, as I understand, there is some authority to determine whether or not the emergency is extraordinary, is there?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, yes; there is a provision in the eight-hour law which provides for that.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to say in the beginning that I am heartily in favor of the eight-hour law and of this bill, but I want an explanation of one clause of this bill. The other day a Senate amendment to a bill was concurred in, providing that certain improvements on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers should be regarded as emergency work. It was pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] at that time that that would probably exempt that work from the provisions of the eight-hour law. Now, in connection with that I desire to ask the gentleman what the effect will be of the provision in the last line of page 2, where this language is found—

Except in case of extraordinary emergency.

Perhaps the gentleman has answered the question already, but there was so much confusion that we could not hear on this side.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That question has been answered; yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I could not hear the gentleman's answer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The language is the same as the bill passed the other day, and inasmuch as that has been defined as an extraordinary emergency, I suppose that this bill will not apply to that particular work.

Mr. WILLIS. Then if this bill passes, notwithstanding the fact that Congress is wisely and properly undertaking to embody the principles of the eight-hour law here, on that river work it will not apply?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I said it would not apply to cases of extraordinary emergency. I do not think the Senate and the House would attempt to do something that they ought not to do, and if Congress have declared something to be an extraordinary emergency that is not one they have done wrong. I think that this destruction of the levees, due to the floods, has made it a work of extraordinary emergency to make life and property secure and possibly in order that the crops may grow without being destroyed and to preserve the health of the people. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] can explain that better than I can. I am not so familiar with the subject as he.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say, further, that an improvement that seeks to avoid a flood a year or so from now is not an extraordinary emergency, and therefore the 8-hour law should apply; but it is provided in that bill that notwithstanding that fact it shall be regarded as emergency work, and consequently the eight-hour law was held not to apply.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I supposed this work was to rebuild what was torn out by the flood. I do not know.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. That is exactly what it is for. It is to restore those great crevasses in the levees which have done such awful damage, and will cost millions of dollars to replace. It is to restore the wave-washed levees. This $4,000,000 will not put the levees back in as good shape as they were in when this extraordinary high water came upon them.

Mr. BUTLER. That should not be considered as emergency work.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. It certainly is emergency work. It is so declared to be in the act. If the gentleman lived down there, back of those levees, and had his property destroyed, as the property of others has been destroyed by these floods, and had the waters finally to recede, and weeks and weeks after the recession found the physical conditions were such that a single pound of dirt could not be moved, and the rains were coming down on him as they have been coming down there nearly ever since the water receded, and as they are liable to continue to come; and if he will consider the fact that millions of yards of dirt will have to be put there to restore those levees, he would surely think it extraordinary emergency work to get those crevasses closed and put those levees in condition for the next high water. Not only must we finish the levees, but we must revet them with grass. We plant Bermuda grass on them, and that work must be done quickly in order to have the grass take root and form a protective sod to prevent wave wash.

If any kind of work of which I have knowledge can be considered extraordinary emergency, it seems to me it is that, and the Congress declared it to be so in the river and harbor bill which passed just a few days ago.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman one further question. I am simply seeking to get at the facts. I understand the gentleman to agree in the interpretation of the proposed law which has been placed upon it by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], that if this bill passes this $6,000,000 will be expended outside of the provisions of the eight-hour law.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Only the part applying to levees. The portion of the $6,000,000 which applies to levees, to wit, $4,000,000, is declared by the river and harbor bill to be for extraordinary emergency work. I do not know that this provision will apply to levee work under subsequent acts of Congress, but that part of the appropriation in the act recently passed is declared to be "extraordinary emergency work," and I think under the terms of the bill which we now have before us the words:

Except in case of extraordinary emergency—

Lines 23 and 24, page 2, would except the levee work which will be done under the river and harbor act passed a few days ago from the general provisions of the pending bill if it become law.

Mr. WILLIS. Then, if I correctly understand the gentleman, the sum of $4,000,000 will be expended outside of the provisions of the eight-hour law.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the language quoted from lines 24 and 25, page 2, of this bill are existing law. The bill does not propose to change existing law, so far as that language is concerned. And even if the appropriation bill referred to had not contained the language that is in it, if the department engaged in the execution of this work had determined that this work on the levees was extraordinary emergency work, the $4,000,000 could have been expended under the existing eight-hour law without regard to an eight-hour workday. The insertion of the clause in the appropriation bill simply gave the expression of the Congress to the fact that it was extraordinary emergency work, and the legislative branch of the Government thereby assumed the responsibility of declaring that it was extraordinary emergency work. The passage of this bill would not in any manner change that, because it provides for the exemption from the operations of an eight-hour workday all work that is of an extraordinary emergency character. So this bill would not in any manner affect the appropriation to which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] refers.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, 21 States of the Union have eight-hour laws applicable to labor on public works and to State employees. These laws have been adopted within the period of the last 21 years. Colorado, Kansas, New York, and Utah have each furnished a precedent—after long-continued struggles over the question—of the constitutionality of eight-hour laws and their applicability to public works done by contractors.

It is apparent to me that a large majority of our citizens are favorable to a shorter workday or the eight-hour law, because in States like Colorado in the West and New York in the East, where it has been necessary to revise the State constitutions to secure an eight-hour law, the people have voted strongly in favor of it.

In Colorado a law was enacted in March, 1899, providing for eight hours in mines, smelters, and blast furnaces, but in the ensuing October the supreme court of the State unanimously decided it to be unconstitutional. On November 4, 1902, a constitutional amendment embodying the terms of this law, which had been approved by all the political parties, was submitted to the people under the referendum at the general election and adopted by a vote of 72,980 yeas to 26,266 nays. The general assembly of Colorado at the close of its next session, from January 7 to April 6, 1903, adjourned without enacting an eight-hour law, as directed by this constitutional amendment, but in 1905 it passed a law which in part resembles the organic act, but is inadequate, reflecting neither its letter or spirit.

In New York an eight-hour "public works" law, with a "prevailing rate of wages" clause, was enacted in 1897 and amended in 1899 and again in 1900. The "prevailing rate of wages" clause was decided to be unconstitutional, as was also any penalty for the violation of the eight-hour provision.

In 1905, however, the people, by means of the referendum, adopted the following amendment to the constitution by a vote of 338,570 ayes and 133,606 nays:

> The legislature may regulate and fix the salaries, the hours of labor, and make provision for the protection, welfare, and safety of persons employed by the State or by any county, city, town, or other civil division of the State or by any contractor or subcontractor performing work, labor, or services for the State or for any county, city, town, village, or other civil division thereof.

In accordance with this constitutional amendment the legislature of 1906 enacted the present law, which, with an amendment adopted in 1907 extending its scope, is regarded as efficient and satisfactory to the wageworkers of the State. In a case in which the comptroller of New York City refused to pay for work performed in violation of the law, the contractor secured a writ directing payment, but on appeal by the comptroller the court of appeals, the highest court of the State, sustained the law with this significant expression of opinion:

> The constitution was amended because it did not confer power upon the legislature to fix and regulate the hours of labor in doing public work or the wages to be paid. * * * The legislature acted under the amendment and reenacted the precise law, the overthrow of which by the courts made the amendment necessary. * * * The people in exercising their supreme power did not do a vain act, but effected a definite purpose. * * * We uphold the statute simply because the people have so amended the constitution as to permit such legislation. The command of the people made in the form prescribed by law must be enforced by the courts.

At the present stage of the discussion of reducing the hours of the workday it is no longer necessary to set out to prove the benefits to mankind gained everywhere in industrial life through cutting off all the hours of employment above 10. On the shelves of every public library in our cities are books and reports by the score telling of communities made more healthy, more sober, more happy, more enlightened by removing the burden of the intolerably excessive toil to which the workers generally were formerly driven. To lop off the 2, 3, and even 4 hours above 10 was a long step toward substituting humanity for brutality. More than that, economically nothing was lost. At the end of the year the worker on the average yielded as much output at 10 hours as at the longer day. He worked more days, he applied more muscle to his task, and he rose from an automaton drudge to an intelligent mechanic. It is also to be noted that every reduction in the hours of daily labor has been followed by new and better tools and devices by which the productivity of the workers working under an eight-hour day has been vastly increased over the former long-hour workday.

With the progressive intensity of application under modern methods and speeded-up machinery, workmen by daily experience know, and with hardly an exception the trained and careful investigators of working-class life employed by either the Government or sociological agencies are by diversified observation convinced that 10 hours in an industrial pursuit strain the nerves and weaken the general physique of even strong men, the total result being a detriment to the race. With the recent necessarily changed modes of living, especially in large communities, the 10 hours at work mean more nearly 12 hours' absence from home, transit to and from the work place being included.

The laborer's strength diminishes gradually in the course of the day. The last hours count against him most. Bodily ailments then develop in his weak spots. The quality of his work then falls off. His aversion, born of weakness and exhaustion, then takes root toward the natural avocations of a healthy nature in the hours off from the daily grind. It is then that, with a certain percentage of the worn-out toilers, a craving for stimulant arises, foreshadowing the deplorable consequence of indulgence in drink. It is then that the workman is unfitted to take part during the evenings in the various duties of his life; hence he is the less worthy as a citizen, the less helpful to the constructive institutions of society, the less a watchful, patient, and competent father of a family.

The testimony as to what the wageworkers who enjoy the eight-hour day have done with the two hours now their own which once were given to the employer is to be seen in a number of callings in many parts of the country. One effect is beyond doubt. Their new-found time they have employed in such a way as to decrease the death rate, and hence obviously the lost time through illness, in their occupations. Every trade-union which pays a death benefit shows from its books a decrease in payments per thousand members since it has had the eight-hour day. In this fact alone the body of the argument for an eight-hour workday, on the score of health, is carried to the point of conviction. Men who are living longer than their predecessors at the same calling are obviously living better in all the implications of the word. They and their families are housed better, dressed better, fed better, educated better—in all respects, as a whole, are happier. This truth is to be seen in so many industries and communities, it is a truth that so appeals to common sense and ordinary observation, as well as to the conviction developed in us with experience that man tends to elevate himself with opportunity, that to attempt to prove it by statistics and recapitulations of the inquiry were to misapply man's discriminating faculty.

In proposing an eight-hour day the first question to be settled is economic. It is whether the total output will warrant the possible lessening of effective toil. In other words, can society sustain itself and progress on eight hours' work? To this query the industrial wageworkers reply, "There has been no diminution of output by reason of the reduction of hours of labor from 10 to 8. In not a few occupations the output has not varied from the results of 10 hours, the number of human workers remaining the same in proportion. Workers, with the aid of new machinery, within the period of the present generation have in nearly all occupations vastly increased product. Besides, the cessation of the two hours' work in his vocation has given the worker opportunity to add to his product in his avocations. His leisure hours, it may be said without paradox, have given him the time, opportunity, and pleasure of caring for his house, his garden, and his side ventures. The eight-hour day has given more, not less, of material things to the world. A whole continent, as is the case of Australia, may have the eight-hour day and mankind be the richer.

It is clear that the eight-hour day is not only a boon to the men, women, and children who toil—to humanity—but that through it, when it shall have become general, the present total production of society will be increased.

The foremost demand of the organized-labor movement is for a shorter workday. It is in the interest of labor; it must necessarily be in the interest of progress. The eight-hour day is the harbinger of more successful industry and commerce, its tendency is upward, and it will surely help to solve the greatest of all the material problems of our lives on a peaceful and permanent plane.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to ask the gentleman any question. I ask unanimous consent that the author of this bill, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. WILSON], who is unavoidably detained, may have leave to extend remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] requests that his colleague [Mr. WILSON] be given unanimous consent to print remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent to print remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I make the same request for myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the same request for himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill before us is a bill relating to limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics. It is an eight-hour bill. I have a very decided opinion in regard to matters of hours of labor. It was my good fortune—as I look back on it now I consider it good fortune—that in my youth and early manhood I engaged in quite a variety of employments in which, for a considerable number of years, I did the hardest sort of manual labor.

I was possessed of a good constitution, blessed with good health, and with that power of recuperation which a kind Providence gives to us in our youth. Yet I well remember many a day when the closing hours of the forenoon and the closing hours of the afternoon brought me to a state where it was almost impossible for me to do good and effective work, to give that energy, care, and attention to my work which was required to be faithful and efficient in the labor in which I was employed. I know of no subject, economic, sociological, humanitarian—for it is all of these—in regard to which public opinion has changed so rapidly in the last 10 or 15 years as it has with regard to the hours of employment. A short time ago I talked with a gentleman in whose employ many years ago I, with fair efficiency, I think—and I take some pride in that—polished the head of a drill with an 8-pound hammer in the deep and wintry recesses of the Black Canyon of the Gunnison, in Colorado. When I knew him, himself sprung from the ranks of labor, big, strong, vigorous, active, forceful, he found it hard to believe that any man had done his duty until he worked at least 10 hours. Talking with him recently he said:

> On some Government work on which I employed many hundreds of men recently I was required to comply with the 8-hour law. It was a new experience to me. I undertook it with some misgivings and with considerable regret. I am glad I had that experience. I never had so satisfactory work done in all my experience. I never did a piece of work surrounded with as many difficulties which I executed and completed as satisfactorily as I did that piece of work, and, strange to say, while I paid my men for 8 hours practically what I would have paid them for 10 hours the cost was, in my opinion, and based on experience of many years, but little, if any, more than it would have been under the 10-hour day.

Mr. Chairman, those of you who have labored at good, hard, physical labor will understand what this means. Let us take, for instance, any work requiring the expenditure of the maximum of physical effort, or work requiring close, constant, straining attention. When a man has done that sort of thing for 10 hours he must be a remarkable man if he is in condition for the next day's work. He will do nearly as much in 8 hours, and he will do it better and much more cheerfully than in 10 hours. So that, from the standpoint of industry, my opinion is that we shall in the long run profit in quality and, in many cases, in quantity of work if we adopt 8 hours in most lines of employment. There are some lines of employment in which it will be difficult, perhaps impossible, to reduce the hours of labor to 8 without considerable readjustment of business, but where it can be done the movement toward the shorter day should be encouraged. Looking at it from the higher standpoint of humanity, it gives the man who works with his hands some time, other than the hours that he should have for rest and refreshment, for recreation and improvement. Remember, there are many men who have gotten what little education they have been able to pick up largely in the odd hours before and after the day's work, and that will be true even under the more generally favorable conditions for acquiring an education which prevail to-day. We are approaching the time when, in my opinion, there will be but little objection on the part of anyone to the general adoption of the shorter day, in the interest of industry and in the interest of humanity.

But, Mr. Chairman, I understand there is but little opposition to the general purposes of this bill, and therefore no necessity for arguing the question at length. I propose to crave the indulgence of the House for a short time to discuss some matters which are in a way pertinent to a bill to limit the hours of labor, for they relate to subjects in regard to which certain gentlemen have been working overtime. It has not been an 8-hour proposition at all. It has covered, in the main, 24 hours a day and 7 days in the week—a work, in my opinion, which the gentlemen themselves, those who have been most busily engaged in it, will, when they have time to reflect, and in the cold, gray dawn of the morning after the 5th of November, feel was a work entirely without warrant or justification. I refer to some things that have been said, charges that have been made, relative to the right of certain delegates to seats in the national Republican convention recently held at Chicago.

Before, during, and since the meeting of the Republican national convention at Chicago, Col. Roosevelt and some of his supporters have repeatedly and in the most violent and intemperate language made the most serious charges of fraud and wrongdoing in connection with the election and seating of a large number of delegates to the convention. The gravity of these charges, the vehemence with which they have been uttered, and the persistency with which they have been reiterated, coming as it has in a period of unrest and suspicion, have profoundly influenced many good people.

The faith a large number of people have in some of those who gave utterance to or repeated these charges had much to do with disposing many people to accept them as gospel. Few people realize how men may, in the first instance, be misled by overzealous or unscrupulous subordinates or supporters, or by the statements of those claiming to be informed as to facts, and how difficult it is for even the best of men to admit an error after proclaiming it, particularly if it serves an all-controlling ambition.

American political history has furnished sufficient examples of the extremes to which men will go in making unmerited charges under the spur of political ambition or from the sting of political disappointment to make our people cautious in accepting as the truth sensational charges prompted by such influences.

It should be remembered that the Republican Party, with its marvelous and glorious history of achievement in the cause of liberty, righteousness, and good government, has, at various times in its history, been the victim of the most extreme, vindictive, and abusive assaults from within its own ranks, and that its leaders who are to-day most revered were in the days of their activity and usefulness most villianously reviled and denounced.

Nothing in history is more astounding to the student of to-day than the abuse heaped upon Lincoln and the charges made against him, as representative of his party, by men within the party when he was a candidate for reelection. Many here can recall the measureless and vitriolic vehemence of the assaults on the honesty and integrity of the party and its leaders by men calling themselves Republicans during the Liberal Republican movement in 1872 and the free-silver bolt in 1896, and at other times.

Unfortunately people who ought to be warned by having been misled at other times by mere violence of assertion and vehemence of denunciation seem to have short memories with regard to such matters. Furthermore, we have a new generation of voters who, inexperienced in politics and being of honest and conscientious intent and purpose, are inclined to accept charges made with fine simulation of sincerity as evidence, and vehement reiteration in frenzied imitation of outraged virtue as conclusive proof.

The truth is ever at a temporary disadvantage in the presence of persistent prevarication, loudly and violently proclaimed. Those who would profit by charging others with wrongdoing in matters political invariably consider it necessary to employ the language of extravagance, sensation, and abuse to challenge and fix public attention while, he who tells the simple truth finds neither warrant nor excuse for more than the plain, unvarnished, unsensational tale. To reply in kind to abuse and vituperation is but to cheapen the quality of truth.

NOT AGAINST INDIVIDUALS BUT THE PARTY.

It should be remembered that the charges made against the manner of seating the delegates at Chicago are not charges against any individual or set of individuals, but against a great party as represented at the only Nation-wide gathering of the party. Men and parties do not become corrupt overnight. A party that will do a great wrong to-day could not have been honest yesterday, last year, or four years ago, and yet a majority of the majority of the national committee which decided these cases were members of the committee four years ago, when Mr. Roosevelt was pleased with and indorsed the committee's work. In the convention among the majority were many who had been personal and political friends of Mr.

Roosevelt when he was President and had enjoyed his confidence. Had the character of all these men changed?

It had not been my purpose to make any statement in the House or elsewhere in regard to these cases. My mind and conscience have been so clear about them that I have felt discussion was almost superfluous. I have been reminded, however, that as the only present Member of the House who was a member of the committee on credentials I owed it to my colleagues to at least briefly review the more generally discussed cases.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] served on the national committee during the hearings of the contest cases, and I am glad to know that he contemplates discussing them. Our friend and late colleague, Mr. MALBY, served faithfully in the committee on credentials, including the wearisome all-night session. I sat near him, and noticing his appearance of fatigue begged him to retire. Consciencious and honorable gentleman that he was, he refused to do so, saying he preferred to hear the argument and evidence in every case. I fear that the strain of these long, trying sessions shortened our friend's days; if so, he was a martyr to duty.

IMPORTANT TRUTH BE KNOWN.

There are reasons why the truth in regard to these contests should be known, why the reckless statements with regard to them should be refuted of far greater and more far-reaching importance than any question of the effect these statements and charges will have upon the fortunes of any party or candidates in the coming election. This great Republic of ours, the greatest and most successful experiment in free government the world has ever known, is a Government of parties. The very continuation of our Government depends not only upon the honesty and integrity of the people in the management of great party organizations and otherwise, but in the continued confidence of the people in such honesty and integrity.

THE CHANGE IS IN ROOSEVELT.

If the organization of a great party which has been a leader in great moral and political movements can become so corrupted between presidential campaigns as to commit such political crimes as it is charged were committed in Chicago the party is not only in a bad way but the country is beyond redemption. If a party of which Mr. Roosevelt had the support and an organization which four years ago he trusted—and some say controlled—could in so brief a time become so lost to all sense of decency, what hope is there for a new party which he might create? The members of the national committee, whose action at Chicago Mr. Roosevelt denounces in such intemperate terms, were four years ago, in Mr. Roosevelt's estimation, entirely fair-minded, intelligent, and honorable gentlemen. Is it probable that they all fell from that high estate in so short a time? Is it unreasonable to suggest that perhaps the change is in Mr. Roosevelt and not in the national committee and the membership of the convention?

APPROPRIATING ELECTORS.

The claim that Col. Roosevelt was denied the nomination at Chicago through the larceny of delegates is not only expected to contribute directly to the third-party movement, but it is expected to contribute even more potently indirectly by furnishing the excuse for the most impudent and revolutionary plan of political larceny ever conceived. It is proposed to appropriate the livery and secure the benefits of Republican State organizations, while at the same time repudiating the party and candidates. It is difficult to conceive a more shameless proposal of pure piracy than this.

PENNSYLVANIA.

In Pennsylvania, for instance, about a third of the Republicans of the State expressed a preference for Mr. Roosevelt for President. He was not nominated, but the men who were temporarily placed in command of the Republican ship by a third of the Republican voters are expected, I am told, to continue to fly the Republican flag at the masthead and secure whatever benefits can be thus obtained with the expectation of eventually, whatever happens, scuttling the ship after having gotten away with the cargo.

The local boss of the new crew, being a more cautious pirate than some others, has suggested that while he hopes and expects to turn the cargo secured under the Republican emblem over to the enemy, he thinks, in decency, he ought to hold out some hope to Republicans that, if they prove to be the majority of the crew, they may secure the benefits of the cargo obtained under their flag. But the chief, under whose orders he seems to be operating, repudiates any such mushy procedure; if you are to be a pirate, be a pirate, quoth he; carry their flag as long as it is to your interest to do so, but eventually make them walk the plank and scuttle the ship.

The Democrats of my native State of Missouri, by a large and enthusiastic majority, expressed their preference first, last, and all the time as a candidate for the Presidency for their beloved fellow citizen, the honored and respected Speaker of this House. He had a majority of the delegates in the Democratic national convention; a majority of the delegates in that convention voted for him on roll call nine different and distinct times. By all reasonable and proper rules he was the candidate of the convention. In the moment of his triumph the great prize was ruthlessly snatched from him without warrant, justification, or excuse. Why are not the Democrats in Missouri proposing to have the Democratic electors in that State vote for CHAMP CLARK?

If there are any electors anywhere who have any sort of a justification for being traitors to the binding and sacred obligation which rests upon an elector to vote for the candidate of the party that placed him in nomination, they are the Democratic electors in Missouri. I assume, however, that they, like the man they honored with their votes, are honest citizens, and therefore no such thought has entered their minds. They have probably realized, if they have even thought of it, how clearly traitorous would be the act suggested, how destructive of our plan of electing Presidents. What excuse and opportunity would be offered for the most outrageous scandals in the case of a close vote in the electoral college if electors are held to be free to vote as their fancy or interests dictates. We have so far heard these shameless proposals only from men who hope to profit by overturning the legal machinery of our Government. I am not prepared to believe that the men who have received party nominations as electors are so recreant to their solemn obligations as to commit such acts of perfidy or that the people generally would tolerate them.

COMMITTEE ON CREDENTIALS.

I accepted service on the committee with reluctance, upon the insistence of my colleagues, because I realized the hard work that would be required and the inevitable criticism from one side or the other that was sure to follow. At that time my only knowledge of the facts with regard to the contested cases had been obtained from reading the daily papers, many of them reflecting the view of the cases taken by extreme Roosevelt adherents. So far as I had any definite opinion with regard to the cases which it would require evidence to remove, it was in favor of the Roosevelt delegates in certain cases to which I shall refer hereafter.

The committee on credentials of the Republican national convention was in session in all aproximately 40 hours, equivalent to five 8-hour days. In order to prepare cases for consideration of the convention it held one continuous session of nearly 30 hours. Every contestant who appeared was given a hearing. Ample time was given for the presentation of cases, in one case over three hours being devoted, at the request of the Roosevelt contestants, to a case which had been unanimously decided in favor of the Taft delegates by the national committee. No man can honestly say, and I think no contestant has said, or will say, that he was not given a fair, extended, and courteous hearing by the committee on credentials. I think that statement also applies to the hearings before the national committee, which heard contest cases for 15 days.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Were not those hearings public?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; both before the national committee and the committee on credentials were public.

Mr. HILL. And that for the first time in the history of the party?

Mr. MONDELL. For the first time in the history of any political party, as far as I know. The four great newspaper associations of the country were represented at all of those hearings, and their men were there all of the time and took notes of what was done and said, so that there was nothing said by anyone in connection with any of these contests that was not heard by the newspaper correspondents.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand the gentleman to say that he attended the sessions of the committee on credentials quite continuously. The member of the committee from my State, Mr. S. X. Way, is a gentleman I know very well. I intend to get his opinion on these several contests, assuming that he was present at the hearings. Does the gentleman know whether he was present or not?

Mr. MONDELL. I was present at all of the hearings, except for a short time on the Texas cases. It is impossible for me to say, of course, just how continuously all of the other gentlemen attended. When our committee first met, and before we had transacted any business or adopted rules, the member from California, after talking threateningly and excitedly for a few moments, dramatically shouted, "Follow me to the Florentine room," which room was, I understand, Col. Roosevelt's headquarters. Whereupon there was a somewhat ridiculous scramble on the part of certain gentlemen to see who could get out of the room first. My recollection is that the member on the committee from South Dakota was one of the bolters. At varying intervals they more or less shamefacedly returned, or, rather, as we understood it, were ordered back by the Roosevelt bosses, with the suggestion they better not bolt until they had some excuse for so doing. I don't know just when the member on the committee from South Dakota slid back—I do not want to do him an injustice—but I am very much mistaken if he heard most of the contests. Some of those who have been loudest in their denunciation of what was done heard but very little of the testimony or arguments before our committee. That is particularly true of the members from California and Illinois.

NUMBER OF CONTESTS.

There were contests filed before the national committee involving the seats of 252 out of 1,078 delegates in the convention. Of these, 238 were brought by Roosevelt contestants against Taft delegates. Some of these contests were so utterly frivolous that they were not even urged before the national committee when it met for the purpose of making up the temporary roll for the convention. The committee was in session 15 days, and a large majority of contests which were heard by the national committee were decided by that committee by unanimous, or practically unanimous, vote, and in the cases where there was a difference of opinion the vote in favor of the delegates who were seated constituted in most of the cases a majority of two-thirds or over.

After the national committee had made up the temporary roll of the convention, Mr. Roosevelt's managers made up a list of cases to be presented to the committee on credentials of the convention, involving the title to 128 seats, thus surrendering all claims to 110 of the seats which had been originally contested. That even this list of 128 was padded by cases known to have no merit is evidenced by the fact that the contests which were actually presented for the consideration of the committee on credentials involved but 92 seats, some of which were seats which the national committee had unanimously given to Taft delegates. The fact is, therefore, that of the 238 contests originally brought by the Roosevelt people but 92 were taken before the body whose duty it was to finally determine who were entitled to seats in the convention. The Roosevelt people had abandoned 146 of their contests before reaching the convention or its credentials committee.

FRIVOLOUS CHARACTER OF CONTESTS.

Before taking up the questions involved in the remaining cases it might be interesting and profitable to inquire into the nature and the character of most of the contests brought on behalf of Mr. Roosevelt and the way in which they were brought. Of course, it does not prove anything for me to say that the overwhelming majority were of the most frivolous character; that they were brought deliberately for the purpose of confusing the issue, misleading the public, and laying the foundation for the outrageous charges which followed. As my mere statement of belief is not evidence, I should not express that opinion if it were not fully justified and substantiated by facts that are not questioned and by the admission of Roosevelt supporters.

In many of the cases from the Southern States, notably Virginia, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, almost complete sets of Roosevelt contesting delegates were named at alleged conventions, in no way worthy of the name, held from two to three months after the Taft delegates had been regularly elected. It is notorious that the holding of these "conventions" and the naming of these delegates was due to the activity of a certain astute gentleman from the North operating in the interest of Mr. Roosevelt, and said to have been liberal in expenditure.

MR. MUNSEY'S TESTIMONY.

We have some very illuminating testimony from a very high Roosevelt source as to the reasons for bringing these contests. I need not remind gentlemen how very enthusiastic Mr. Frank A. Munsey has been in his support of Mr. Roosevelt. In the literary and journalistic world Mr. Munsey has been by all odds the most enthusiastic and emphatic supporter of the ex-President. His paper, the Washington Times, published in this city, and his magazines have devoted their energies for months to further the cause of Mr. Roosevelt. Mr. Judson C. Welliver is the trusted political writer on the Times who was given a free hand to boost first the Roosevelt candidacy and now the Roosevelt third party. Mr. Welliver went to Chicago to watch the contest proceedings before the national committee. He saw that body, upon which there were a considerable number of ardent Roosevelt supporters, cast into the discard by unanimous vote one after another of the trumped-up, fictitious, fraudulent contests, and it occurred to Mr. Welliver, and no doubt to Mr. Munsey, that it was necessary to revive the drooping spirits of the Roosevelt adherents, who had been fooled and misled by the bringing of these contests. It appeared to be necessary to tell some truths, and Mr. Welliver proceeded to do so in a dispatch from Chicago, published in the Washington Times of Sunday evening, June 9, which is in part as follows:

ROOSEVELT FORCES REGAIN CONFIDENCE DESPITE COMMITTEE'S WORK—CONTESTS UNABLE TO CHANGE RESULT—ARRIVAL OF WILLIAM FLINN STRIKES TERROR INTO HEARTS OF ADMINISTRATION MEN.

(By Judson C. Welliver.)

CHICAGO, June 9.

Seventy-two contested seats in the convention have been passed on by the Republican national committee and every one has been given to the Taft claimants. That sounds as if Taft was making a tremendous inroad on Roosevelt strength; but the fact is that it has little significance.

In order that the reading public, getting its impressions from the daily reports of repeated determinations in Taft's favor, may not misunderstand just what is happening, it is necessary to go back to the beginning of this campaign and explain some things.

When the national committee met in Washington last December there were persistent rumors that Roosevelt might be a candidate. La Follette was already in the field.

GOT AN EARLY START.

The Taft people knew their weakness, and were scared about the situation. They adopted the plan of holding conventions in the South early, because there they had the machinery and could rush matters through with the strong-arm procedure and stow away a fine bunch of delegates, while the Roosevelt movement was still unorganized; indeed, before Roosevelt could be announced.

This they did, and on the day when Roosevelt formally announced that he was a candidate, something over a hundred delegates had actually been selected. When Senator DIXON took charge of the campaign, a tabulated showing of delegates selected to date would have looked hopelessly one sided. Moreover, a number of Southern States had called their conventions for early dates and there was no chance to develop the real Roosevelt strength in the great Northern States till later.

For psychological effect, as a move in practical politics, it was necessary for the Roosevelt people to start contests on these early Taft selections in order that a tabulation of delegate strength could be put out that would show Roosevelt holding a good hand in the game. A table showing "Taft, 150; Roosevelt, 19; contested, 0," would not be very much calculated to inspire confidence. Whereas one showing "Taft, 23; Roosevelt, 19; contested, 127," looked very different.

WHY THEY WERE STARTED.

That is the whole story of the larger number of Southern contests that were started early in the game. It was never expected that they would be taken very seriously; they served a useful purpose, and now the national committee is deciding them in favor of Taft; in most cases, without real division.

CONTESTS TOO RAW.

The southern contests were too raw for the stomachs of even the most prejudiced Roosevelt supporters. It must have been galling to have to admit that these contests were simply gotten up to fool the people, to bring in the wavering brethren, who when in doubt resolve it in favor of the most promising band wagon, by making them believe that Roosevelt had many more delegates than he really had. I do not now recall a more humiliating confession of an attempt to fool the people.

The Chicago Tribune, vigorously supporting Col. Roosevelt, on June 8, after referring to the decision of the national committee in the Alabama cases, gave the comment of Col. Roosevelt on the cases as follows:

The colonel showed the reporters a table of delegates he expected to be awarded on the Alabama list. It was shown that he had conceded 22 to President Taft and claimed only 2 for himself.

"You see, I hadn't counted on anything except that one district," he said.

And yet in the colonel's interest all the Alabama delegates had been contested, and all were claimed for him by his managers.

But to return to Mr. Welliver's article. After admitting and conceding the fraudulent and psychological character of most of the contests, having abandoned the first line of defense and admitted it was mounted with straw guns, a new position was taken behind cases now claimed to be valid with all the positiveness with which all the cases had formerly been defended. He said:

The ninth Alabama was an exception. There is every reason to believe that Roosevelt was entitled to those two delegates. He was robbed of them, just as he is to be robbed of the Indiana, Kentucky, Michigan, and Missouri delegates that he ought to get and just as he will be robbed of the Washington State delegation if the Taft people are convinced that they must do it to save themselves.

The point is that these contests never were listed as available assets of the Roosevelt campaign. It rested on no such flimsy foundation.

We are here solemnly assured that the ninth Alabama is "an exception." It is, in the sense that it is an exceptionally weak case. In the case of the Indiana, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, and Washington delegations we are assured an awful robbery was to be committed. How unfortunate it was and is that these champions of Col. Roosevelt could not have looked forward and have known that, in the Indiana case, all of Col. Roosevelt's friends and supporters were to vote with the other members of the committee to seat the Taft delegates; that in the case of the Missouri delegates at large they were to be given with equal unanimity to Col. Roosevelt. As to the Michigan delegates at large, they were given to Taft without a roll call; and in the case of the Kentucky delegates at large, but 11 members of the committee of 52 found it in their hearts to vote for the Roosevelt delegates.

DISFRANCHISING DEMAND.

The impudent demand made by those responsible for faked and flimsy contests, that no delegate whose seat was brought in question by such contests should vote on any question, was a case of adding insult to injury. It was a demand that those who brought the contests—they afterwards admitted were mostly without merit—should benefit by their own wrongdoing to the extent of controlling the convention, steal the ship after having, as sailors under the same flag, disabled the majority of the crew.

Such a rule would allow the most insignificant minority to control a convention by the simple process of bringing trumped-up, eleventh-hour contests against the majority, thus disqualifying them from participating in the convention. This is exactly what the Roosevelt people tried to do in Chicago.

This extraordinary demand was based on the preposterous assumption that the bringing of a fake contest against a delegate rendered him incapable of honestly deciding contests involving others or other questions coming before the convention. To deny a vote to such delegates would leave the convention in control of those who were instrumental in fraudulently bringing their seats into question, on the theory, no doubt, that one who has laid the preliminary plans for a larceny is in a better frame of mind to do justice than his victim.

Reduced to few words, what was proposed was that, having given notice of contemplated wholesale theft, all the proposed victims were to be disarmed to allow the easy and expeditious perpetration of the outrage.

Parliamentary law denies one whose right to a seat is challenged the privilege of voting on the question. The rule was strictly observed in the Chicago convention. No one voted on their own contest.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is the law in my State.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from South Dakota calls my attention to the fact that the rule is the law in his State. It is a parliamentary rule everywhere, and it is very proper that it should have the sanction of statute.

MOTION TO PURGE THE ROLL.

After the Republican convention had temporarily organized it was proposed by a motion to "purge," as was stated, the convention roll of Taft delegates claimed to be wrongfully placed on the temporary roll and seat Roosevelt delegates in their stead.

Ninety-two seats were named, but this included 18 delegates from Virginia and 2 from the District of Columbia, where contests were so frivolous that they were entirely abandoned, leaving 72 seats as the number which it is understood Col. Roosevelt and some of his supporters now refer to as the "stolen seats." The list is as follows:

Ninth Alabama	2
Arizona	6
Fifth Arkansas	2
Fourth California	2
Thirteenth Indiana	2
Seventh Kentucky	2
Eighth Kentucky	2
Eleventh Kentucky	2
Michigan	6
Third Oklahoma	2
Second Tennessee	2
Ninth Tennessee	2
Texas	8
First, second, fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and fourteenth Texas	18
Washington	8
First, second, and third Washington	6
Total	72

It might be pertinent to inquire by what peculiar and extraordinary power of perfect discrimination the Roosevelt people are able to now differentiate these cases from the 146 other contested cases which they brought and in whose defense they were individually or collectively at one time as vehement as they now are in regard to these cases. By what peculiar virtue does one man, by his insistence upon his followers become the sole judge and arbiter of rights to seats in the national Republican convention? What has happened to a number of cases with regard to which Mr. Roosevelt and some of his followers have been most violent but which are not contained in this list of alleged stolen seats? If I recollect rightly, Col. Roosevelt's earliest and one of his most vitriolic and abusive outbursts with regard to delegates had reference to delegates at large from Indiana. No supporter of his on the national committee voted to seat the contesting Roosevelt delegation. They are not mentioned in this list of delegates that must be unseated in order to "purge the roll."

As the Roosevelt people entirely abandoned their claim as to 146 of the seats they had contested, and their charges of late have been directed toward the contests involving the 72 seats I have referred to, it is not necessary to go into detail as to the abandoned contests, and we may confine ourselves to a somewhat detailed examination of the 72 seats which are the basis of the wholly unwarranted and unjustifiable indictment of a great party and its representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed to the conclusion of his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman how long it would take to conclude his remarks?

Mr. MONDELL. About an hour. I will not take longer than an hour.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] desires to talk in answer to the gentleman from Wyoming. I do not want the extension of time to preclude his answer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Washington will not object to this extension of time. I do not think it will interfere with me at all. I want the gentleman to have all of the time that he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman will proceed for one hour.

NINTH ALABAMA.

In regard to this case, I had received impressions favorably to the Roosevelt delegates from a conversation had with a colleague in the House, before leaving for the convention, and on the basis of the statement which this colleague made to me, believing it to be true, I felt that the Roosevelt delegates had a good case. How much mistaken I was in that impression a statement of the facts in the case will make very clear.

The case involving the two delegates from the ninth Alabama congressional district is somewhat perculiar in this: That if every claim made on behalf of the two Roosevelt delegates is admitted, still, in view of the undisputed facts, the Taft delegates are clearly entitled to seats in the convention.

In this district there is a district committee of 30 members. When the committee met February 15 for the purpose of arranging for a district convention to elect two delegates to Chicago the chairman was absent; without him 15 was a quorum of the committee. On the committee being called to order by the secretary a dispute arose as to the rights of certain persons to serve as members of the committee; and, unable to agree, the committee divided and two meetings were held in the same hall. There is conflicting testimony as to which faction had the majority of the committee; there is no question, however, but what the Birch, or the Taft, crowd had the larger number of members whose right to serve was not questioned, to wit, 13. The right of two men on the Birch side to serve on the committee is called in question, namely, William Latham and Harvey Hardin. As for Latham, it was claimed that not he but his brother James was a member of the committee. In my opinion there is no doubt but what William Latham was the Latham who was a member.

As for Hardin, who was beyond doubt a member of the committee, a few days prior to the meeting he had handed a man not a member of the committee his resignation, with the understanding it was to be returned to him if he was able to attend the meeting. He appeared at Birmingham the night before the meeting of the committee and demanded his resignation returned to him. This was refused. If Latham and Hardin were members of the committee qualified to act, there is no doubt but what the Taft people had a majority of at least one. On the other hand, to admit the Roosevelt claim to a majority of the committee we must disregard the evidence to the effect that Latham and Hardin were lawful members and at the same time admit the authority of the chairman to fill four or five vacancies without referring the matter to the committee, including the vacancy alleged to exist on account of Hardin's resignation. The right of the chairman to fill such vacancies was sharply challenged by the other side.

To me the evidence was conclusive that the Birch, or Taft, people had a majority of the committee. Even admitting, for the sake of argument, that the wrong Latham was present, the absence of anyone in the place of Latham left a committee of 28 and as many Taft as Roosevelt men if the chairman's appointees were recognized.

The fact is, however, that had the Roosevelt men a majority of the committee the subsequent procedure deprived them of any claim for their delegates. There are four counties in the district with regular organizations. The only real office of the district committee was to start in motion the machinery in the counties to select delegates to the district convention. If there had been no quorum at all at the district committee meeting, if but one man had issued the call and it were heeded by the county committees by appropriate action, the resulting nominations would have been valid.

What did happen was that the Republican organizations in all four counties obeyed the call of the Birch, or Taft, committee and held delegate conventions in two and mass conventions in two of the counties, at all of which delegates were elected to the district convention and at the same time to the State convention, which in turn elected the delegates at large, which were seated unanimously by the national committee at Chicago. In due course a district convention was held at which regularly elected delegates from all the counties were present unchallenged. This convention proceeded to elect the Taft delegates, which were seated.

On the other hand, no attention was paid by the county organizations to the call issued by the Hadley, or Roosevelt, faction. In three of the four counties no attempt was made to hold conventions.

A Roosevelt State convention was held in Birmingham, in Jefferson County, May 11, over two months after the convention which elected the Taft delegates. At the same time and place it is claimed that a mass convention was held under the Hadley call for a district convention, and Roosevelt delegates were elected. The report of the minority of the committee on credentials does not attempt to claim any regularity of action on the part of the Roosevelt men after the split in the committee. They base their claim entirely on the assertion that the Birch call was not regular.

ARIZONA.

Arizona was entitled to six delegates at large in the convention. The contest there arose over an unauthorized soap-box primary held in Maricopa County. While alleged contests were started by the Roosevelt men in some of the other counties, none were regarded seriously by anybody except a contest in Cochise, which was settled by seating both delegations, with a divided vote.

The history of the Arizona case is briefly as follows: The call for the State convention to elect delegates to the national convention was regularly issued May 1. In view of the fact that there was no State primary law for the election of delegates to a national convention the call instructed the county committees to meet on the 15th of May and determine which of various methods should be adopted for the appointment or election of delegates to the State convention to be held June 3. Two counties, Pinal and Graham, decided to hold primaries for the election of delegates, and in Graham County this decision was unanimously agreed to. In Cochise and Yuma Counties the Roosevelt people had a majority of the county committees. They decided to have the delegates appointed by the committees. This plan was followed in the other counties in the State except Maricopa.

The county chairman in Maricopa County was a Roosevelt man, and upon the assembling of the county committee he forthwith and without any preliminaries appointed three Roosevelt men as a committee on credentials. This action was challenged, but nevertheless the committee so appointed proceeded to report in favor of seating three proxies. There was further protest and an appeal from the chair, and while this was going on other proxies were presented on behalf of other members who were not present. After further consideration the same committee which had reported the seating of the three proxies later reported against the seating of any proxies. This sudden change of front, due to the fact that if proxies were recognized the Taft men would have a considerable majority, led to a disagreement which resulted in two committee meetings and two calls, one signed by the chairman for a primary to elect delegates to the State convention, and another by the secretary and a pro tempore chairman for a meeting of the county committee to select delegates to the convention. In this connection it should be remembered that in the Roosevelt counties of Cochise and Yuma the delegates were selected by the county committees, on the ground that there was no law under which a legal primary could be held.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Very briefly, I will say to the gentleman, because my time is brief.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not interrupt the gentleman's remarks without his consent, of course. I know two hours is very short when you have such a burden on your hands. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true the Taft men in the county objected to proxies and if it is not true they had their way and all proxies were eliminated under objection of the Taft men?

Mr. MONDELL. First thanking the gentleman from Nebraska for his entirely gratuitous expression of opinion as to the merits of the case, I would say that I have stated the facts exactly as they are and I will state them again if he desires. I heard the testimony of the chairman of the committee, and I think I know what occurred. I heard both sides tell about it.

Mr. NORRIS. But the gentleman was not down in Arizona when it happened.

Mr. MONDELL. No; but I heard both sides of the case before the committee on credentials. The chairman appointed a committee on credentials. There is nobody denying that. The action was challenged, nobody denies that. They reported in favor of seating three proxies. There is no denial of that. And then the same committee appointed by the Roosevelt chairman reported in favor of seating no proxies, and they so reported, because if they had seated the proxies the Taft men would have had a considerable majority.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. If I have the time I have no objection to an interruption. What was the question which the gentleman desires to ask?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand the gentleman, I ask his pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that in this State call in Arizona the county committees had the right under the call to elect the delegates either by the committee, in which case the call fixed the date when it must be done; whether they did not have the right to call the primary, or to call an ordinary convention. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not true those three methods were specifically provided in the State call?

Mr. MONDELL. The State committee provided that the county committees should decide how they should elect their delegates.

Mr. NORRIS. When the county did decide to elect or select the delegates and did it in the way the State committee designated, there is no question of the legality of the delegates selection, is there? The gentleman is emphasizing the fact that in some counties the Roosevelt committee selected delegates. I want to know whether it was legal or not under the law.

Mr. MONDELL. So far as the county of Maricopa is concerned, the majority of the county committee, either as constituted by the members actually present or as it would have been if the proxies had been recognized, never decided to hold primaries; a minority of the committee so decided. I am one of those old-fashioned people who do not believe in the rule of minorities of committees that do not represent the people.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if it is brief; but I never will get through if I continue yielding to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the gentleman, that if he says he does not want to be interrupted I will not do it. I would not like to be discourteous.

Mr. MONDELL. And I do not want to be discourteous.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede the gentleman has the right to say he will not yield, but I want to ask the gentleman, which perhaps appears in his printed speech, which I am following here, whether it is not true that in that primary that he claims was not legal or lawful that there was a vote cast within 80 per cent of the highest vote that was ever cast in a Republican primary in that county?

Mr. MONDELL. Nobody on earth, except the gentlemen who hoped to benefit, knows how many votes were cast at that primary. Arizona has no primary law unless one has been passed since the events related, so I do not know how any legal primary could ever have been held in the county.

Mr. NORRIS. I can give the gentleman the information, if he would like to have it.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman may be able to give me the statement of somebody as to how many votes were alleged to have been cast at a soap-box primary, where anybody could have repeated all day long; anybody could have cast a thousand votes at one time, and where the returning officers could have multiplied the returns a thousand times and not be guilty even of a breach of the peace or a misdemeanor.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman there if it is not true that there never was and never has been any charge brought of any fraudulent vote or anything fraudulent about that primary, except the Taft men claimed that it was illegal—if there is any evidence that there were any fraudulent votes cast there, or that any Democrats voted in that primary?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not recollect that there was much evidence as to the casting of ballots at that primary, if, as a matter of fact, one is justified in referring to such a performance as the casting of ballots. The gentleman asks if there was any charge of fraudulent voting. There could not have been any such thing as fraudulent voting at that primary in the ordinary acceptance of the term. Anybody could have voted—Republican, Democrat, or what not. Anybody could have voted a score of times. Those controlling these misnamed ballot boxes could have made up any returns they saw fit, could have padded them to suit their purpose, and there is no law under which it could have been punished. Probably the Roosevelt people would have considered it in the nature of a good joke. It is very clear that the majority of the county committee and the people in the county who were for Taft believed that anything would be done that it was necessary to do to show a Roosevelt majority. The whole affair was in the hands of the Roosevelt people. No one else was represented. A little later in my speech, if I have time, I want to make some observations to the general subject of soap-box primaries.

Immediately after this call for a primary was issued a majority of the county committee advertised extensively through the newspapers and otherwise, warning Republicans against participating in the primary as it was illegal and irregular. Practically no Republicans except those who were for Roosevelt did participate. There were La Follette men who refused to participate, as did the Taft men, there being but 11 Taft votes cast.

The executive committee of the State committee met two days before the State convention for the purpose of hearing all contests and making up a temporary roll, and timely notice was given to all interested parties. There is no doubt but that all had information as to the date and purpose of the meeting. There was only one contest, that from Cochise County, submitted, and both delegations were seated with a divided vote, and thus the temporary roll was made up.

In the assembling of the convention the temporary roll was read, and objection was made by a gentleman whose name was not on the temporary roll, and his objection was overruled. One nomination only was made for temporary chairman, and the person nominated was declared elected and took his place as temporary chairman.

At this stage of the proceedings a number of gentlemen—less than 20—whose names were on the temporary roll and others went to one side or corner of the hall, and according to all accounts the noise and confusion that ensued was terrific. This band of gentlemen, one of whose number had mounted a platform, proceeded amid loud noise and great confusion, during which time whatever was done was largely by pantomime, to hold what they afterwards referred to as a convention at which they alleged they appointed committees on resolutions and credentials, received and accepted their reports, and elected six delegates to the national convention pledged to Roosevelt.

I asked the gentleman who presented the case before our committee how it was possible to make up and receive reports of committees in so brief a time and amid such confusion. He cheerfully admitted that he believed the reports had been made up beforehand. The regular convention, with 68 of the 93 votes on the temporary roll, remained in session for over two hours. All business was transacted in an orderly way; committees were appointed and reported. The usual votes were taken, and six Taft delegates were elected.

There never was a cleaner case of a prearranged rump convention than this, and it was made necessary, if any excuse was to be had at all for a contest, by reason of the fact that had there been no temporary roll and only the uncontested delegates allowed to participate in the temporary organization the Taft people would have controlled the convention by a considerable majority.

FIFTH ARKANSAS.

From Arkansas contests were originally filed with the national committee covering the delegates at large and those from the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh districts. The national convention was unanimous in seating the Taft delegates from all but the fifth district, and in that district the vote was 42 to 10. That was the only Arkansas case taken before the committee on credentials, and it was one of the cases in the "roll purging" resolutions.

An enterprising gentleman by the name of Redding is clerk of the Federal court at Little Rock. He was a contesting delegate before the national convention four years ago, but he did not carry his case to the committee on credentials, after an adverse decision by the national committee. Mr. Redding, while repudiated, was not discouraged. He claims to have continued an organization in the fifth Arkansas district. True, his organization did not hold any meetings in the interim, did not nominate a candidate for Congress in the last congressional campaign; in fact, Mr. Redding's organization seems to have been in a state of hibernation or suspended animation since his downfall in 1908.

On the other hand, the organization which was recognized in 1908 nominated a candidate for Congress in 1910, kept up an organization, and in due time called a convention to elect a candidate for Congress and delegates to the national convention. This activity seems to have aroused the dormant Redding organization, or Mr. Redding himself, for he seems to have been the whole show. The awakening, however, seems to have been a slow and difficult process, for Mr. Redding gave but three days' notice of the holding of his convention on the same day and in the same town, Little Rock, as the regular convention. Testimony is conflicting as to whether there was a baker's dozen or a score at Mr. Redding's convention, and how many, if any, were Republicans.

The regular convention was well attended. There was but one contest, and both delegations were seated with a divided vote. The proceedings were orderly and in proper form, and the delegates were instructed for Mr. Taft. The Redding convention was a joke, the contest was a farce, and yet this is one of the cases which is being constantly alluded to as a case of stolen delegates.

FOURTH CALIFORNIA.

The fourth California case was not heard before the committee on credentials. When the case was reached in alphabetical order, neither the Roosevelt delegates nor their attorneys could be found, whereupon a messenger was dispatched to inform them that the committee would take up the case whenever it suited their convenience. Several hours later a communication signed by the Roosevelt delegates was presented to the committee. This communication was most insulting in character, impugned the motives of the members of the committee, stated that the Roosevelt delegates had no confidence in the committee, and therefore declined to present their case for the committee's consideration. In the absence of the California member of the committee, who had previously bolted, this communication was presented by another member.

The call for the Republican convention provided—that in no State shall an election be so held as to prevent the delegates from any congressional district and their alternates being selected by the representative electors of the district.

That provision is in accordance with the highly important principle of local self-government. It is founded in justice, equity, and righteousness. Is there a Member within the sound of my voice who questions the wisdom and propriety of that provision.

I will guarantee there is no one who does not believe we ought to insist that the people of a district shall have the right to elect their delegates as they elect their Member of Congress. If there is such, I should like to have him rise and say so. I do not see any gentleman rise.

After that call was issued the Legislature of California, under the influence of the governor, passed a law under which the voters of the entire State voted for all of the district delegates, though the nominations were made by districts.

Under the terms of the call none of the Roosevelt district delegates from California were entitled to seats in the convention. All were seated, however, except the delegates from the fourth district, where the Taft delegates had an undoubted majority of the votes of the district.

The Republican Party may be defeated, and it can stand defeat, but it can not afford to agree to a policy under which the people of a district are virtually disfranchised. The party can not afford to tolerate practices under which great cities will control delegations from whole States. I do not believe any party in this country will ever give its assent to the California plan, the plan which gives bosses their desired opportunity to control delegations.

THIRTEENTH INDIANA.

The next case, taking them up alphabetically, in the "purging resolution" is that of the thirteenth Indiana. It stands in a class by itself, and illustrates how men overreach themselves when they part company with their judgment. I am rather inclined to the opinion that of the delegates elected to the thirteenth Indiana convention a very small majority was at the time the meeting was called to order favorable to Mr. Roosevelt. The test came on the election of a permanent chairman, a Taft man being clearly and legally elected by a very narrow majority. The vote in Laporte County, which was cast for the Taft chairman, was challenged by a delegate from another county on the ground that there were two or more delegates who were instructed for Roosevelt, and therefore intended or were expected to vote for a Roosevelt man for chairman, but on the polling of the delegation the solid vote was again given for the Taft chairman. From Fulton County the Taft chairman received one-half vote more, so it was claimed by outsiders, than the Taft strength in the county, but the delegation stood by its vote.

The election of the Taft chairman seems to have convinced the Roosevelt men that the Taft people had a majority in the convention and they immediately inaugurated the riotous procedure which seems to have been a part of the general plan of the Roosevelt supporters everywhere. When the chairman, following a rule previously adopted, declined to poll a county delegation in regard to the representation of the county on the credentials committee pandemonium broke loose, and the disorder was such that it was difficult to hear the proceedings. The committee on credentials dismissed all contests, of which there were six against Roosevelt delegates and two against Taft delegates. In the midst of fearful din and confusion kept up by Roosevelt people, which lasted several hours, and during which time the chairman used a megaphone, Messrs. Studebaker and Fox, Taft delegates, were declared elected, there being no other nominations made and some of the Roosevelt delegates failing to vote. The result of the vote was not questioned at the time nor for more than a month and a half afterwards.

After the adjournment of the regular convention and as the delegates were leaving the hall, a few delegates gathered under a balcony in a corner of the hall where they remained for not to exceed five minutes. In the meantime the band was playing and the usual confusion attending the adjournment of a meeting was going on. At that time and under those circumstances it was claimed that the contesting delegates were elected. The noise was so great that the probability is that a few of the little handful gathered could hear each other. To call such gathering a convention is ridiculous beyond words.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to yield briefly.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it true that there was a statement presented to your committee, signed by a majority of the members of this convention, stating that they had voted against the election of the Taft delegates?

Mr. MONDELL. No; there were some affidavits to the effect that those signing them had not voted for Taft delegates.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. MONDELL. I said no. That was my answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. NORRIS. The question I wanted particularly to call the gentleman's attention to was when through the megaphone the chairman called for the negative vote on the election of the Taft delegates whether or not there was not a statement presented by ex-Senator Beveridge to your committee signed by a majority of that convention stating that they had voted against that motion?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not recall any such statement. I am quite certain there was none. I think it was conceded there was no considerable vote. Most of the Roosevelt people did not vote. Senator Beveridge did not appear before our committee in regard to the thirteenth Indiana. The gentleman from Nebraska is barking up the wrong tree. He is talking about the wrong contest. Senator Beveridge was before our committee for two long hours in the middle of the night in regard to the Indiana contest at large.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not asked about the Indiana contest at large.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly, if the gentleman has in mind anything that Beveridge said, it has to do with the delegates at large.

Mr. NORRIS. Did he not appear as attorney for the Roosevelt contestants?

Mr. MONDELL. Not according to my recollection on the thirteenth Indiana. He appeared for the delegates at large, of which he was one. I am amazed that the gentleman from Nebraska will stand here and defend outrageous riots such as that in the thirteenth Indiana. If there ever was a case where men were utterly unjustified and unjustifiable in what they did, that was the one.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman remember how Mr. Cady, the La Follette member on the committee, voted on the thirteenth Indiana case?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; he voted with us on the thirteenth Indiana and referred to it in a report he made to the convention, as follows:

> The Roosevelt delegates created such noise and confusion, lasting for hours, that the transaction of business was impossible. It appears, on the other hand, that the Taft forces were enabled to transact the necessary business and elect their delegates. The opposition to the proceedings, resulting in the election of the Taft delegates, was nothing less than a deliberate attempt to create a state of anarchy, and under the circumstances we do not feel that the Roosevelt delegates were entitled to seats against the Taft delegates.

What the gentleman from Nebraska probably has in mind is a bunch of hazy affidavits which were filed as an afterthought and which had reference to the proceedings that day. There were 143 delegates in the convention. There were 70 of these affidavits couched in the most general terms, and it is impossible for anyone to say whether they have reference to the regular convention or to the little five-minute gathering under the balcony in the midst of noise and confusion and band playing when the Roosevelt delegates were said to have been elected. There were four affidavits signed by men who said that they were favorable to Roosevelt, but in the noise and confusion of the convention they did not vote at all and left before the alleged rump convention. If the gentleman is relying on these affidavits he loses his case by his own witness.

I have already stated that I am rather inclined to the opinion that when the convention met there was a small majority—possibly two or three—favorable to Roosevelt, but when the Taft candidate for temporary chairman was elected by a small but unquestioned majority some of the Roosevelt men started a riot, during which some of the Roosevelt men did not vote at all. The major portion of them refused to vote. There was no evidence that any Taft man had anything to do with the noise and confusion. No one claimed anything of the kind, and if the Roosevelt men had kept quiet they would have had abundant opportunity to have displayed their strength, whatever it was. They saw fit, in the words of the gentleman from Wisconsin, to create a state of anarchy.

KENTUCKY.

In Kentucky the policy of "psychological" contests, to which I have heretofore referred, was inaugurated as in other parts of the South. The Taft delegates at large, as well as those from the first, second, fourth, seventh, eighth, and tenth congressional districts were contested. Of these contests only those from the seventh and the eighth were carried to the committee on credentials.

The Republican Party of Kentucky operates under a set of rules adopted long since and uniformly recognized as binding on Republican assemblies and conventions.

SEVENTH KENTUCKY.

The convention in the seventh Kentucky district met in accordance with a regular call, and a temporary roll was made up in accordance with the rule which, in case of a contest, places the delegation on the temporary roll whose credentials are approved by the county chairman.

A Taft man was elected temporary chairman of the convention by a vote of 98 to 47. A committee on credentials, consisting of one member from each county, designated by the delegation, was appointed, and in due course it reported; its report being signed by all of the members of the committee but one who presented a minority report. Not only was the majority report supported by the overwhelming majority of the committee, but it bears every evidence of absolute fairness. The disagreement was particularly over Fayette County. There is abundant evidence that the Taft men were largely in the majority in the mass convention in that county, and that contention is supported by the fact that the chairman, who was favorable to the Roosevelt cause, refused a demand for tellers on the vote for temporary chairman, but proceeded arbitrarily to declare the Roosevelt candidate elected. This arbitrary and revolutionary act on the part of the chairman, which is not disputed, resulted in two conventions in the same hall, one of which elected Taft and the other Roosevelt delegates to the district convention. As I have stated every member of the committee on credentials of that convention except one voted to seat the Taft delegates from that county, and the committee on credentials of the State convention which elected the delegates at large who were seated also held that the Taft delegates from this county were entitled to their seats.

In the Scott County convention the Roosevelt men bolted the convention after tellers had been appointed to count the vote for temporary chairman, but before the vote was taken. In Franklin County the Roosevelt followers bolted immediately after the unchallenged election of the temporary chairman, and they held their convention in the courthouse yard, if a convention it could be called. The testimony is that there was only a handful of people present. In Woodford County the chairman, a Taft man, refused to grant a count of the votes cast for temporary chairman, and following the rule which was followed in a similar case in Fayette County, where the Roosevelt chairman had refused a count, the Taft delegates from Woodford County were unseated and the Roosevelt delegates seated.

In all the Kentucky district cases the purely technical point was raised that after the call for district conventions had been issued the boundaries of the districts were in some instances changed by a redistricting act. Of course, it was impossible to modify the call after it was issued, and this convention was the flimsiest kind of a technicality.

After the report of the committee on credentials of the district convention, as above stated, was adopted, certain Roosevelt men bolted the convention and held another alleged convention elsewhere, and it was the delegates thus elected that the national committee refused to recognize.

EIGHTH KENTUCKY.

In the eighth Kentucky district there are 10 counties. There were 163 votes in the district convention. There were contests from but two counties. If both were given to the Roosevelt men, the Taft forces would have had over 100 out of 163 delegates in the convention. In one of these counties the Roosevelt followers had bolted because the chair appointed tellers when they claimed they wanted them elected. They left before the vote was announced. The Taft delegates were seated in the district convention. In the Boyle County convention the tellers appointed by the chair agreed that the Taft men had a majority, but the chairman refused to accept their statement and certified to the contrary. This delegation was divided and each side given half in the district convention.

After the report of the committee on credentials had been adopted, following the practice which seems to have become a habit with the Roosevelt people, a few of them bolted the convention. One of the flimsy pretexts for so doing was that some of those who participated were from a county not in the new congressional district, though they were in the congressional district at the time the call was issued.

After the regular convention had adjourned a rump convention was held by the Roosevelt men, at which they elected the contesting delegates to the convention. It has never been claimed that this rump convention contained a majority or anything more than a small minority of delegates who had presented any claim of a right to sit in the district convention. The national convention very properly refused to recognize delegates so elected.

ELEVENTH KENTUCKY.

The eleventh Kentucky was a Taft contest. The "purging resolution" claimed that two votes were stolen in that district. As a matter of fact, only one vote was given to Taft by the national committee, the matter having been compromised by seating one each of the Roosevelt and Taft delegates. As a member of the committee on credentials, I heard this case with great interest, for it was a case where the usual procedure was reversed. In this case the Taft delegates instead of the Roosevelt delegates bolted the district convention. It is true they had abundant cause for so doing. The chairman, a Roosevelt man, constituted himself the whole show, and ran things with a high hand, as is evidenced by the fact that 284 delegates out of a total membership of 384 repudiated the proceedings under the chairman and proceeded to elect delegates. If a bolt was ever justified it certainly was on that occasion, but the weary monotony of bolts by Roosevelt men on the flimsiest pretext disinclined me to favor bolts, and in this case I voted to seat both of the Roosevelt men. It was the first case in regard to which there had been a shadow of doubt in my mind. I was anxious to resolve it in favor of the Roosevelt men, but the majority of the committee believed the decision of the vote as agreed upon by the national committee was fair.

MICHIGAN.

The contest involving the six delegates at large from Michigan and the incidents leading up to it furnish capital material for a farce comedy, in which a highly impulsive governor, not so long ago for Taft, at the time of our story for Roosevelt, and now for Wilson, played a star part. A company of the State militia also figures in a picturesque but rather unwilling part. A millionaire ex-member of the Cabinet under Mr. Roosevelt, who had imbibed the spirit of the new nationalism to the point where he considered himself justified in running conventions, if he had a chance, according to his own sweet will, and a State chairman who, after the manner of some other small boys, refused to play unless he could run the game, took prominent serio-comic parts.

To begin with, the State chairman, who was a pronounced Roosevelt man, declined to sanction a call for a meeting of the State committee preliminary to the State convention issued by the secretary and approved by a majority of the committee; he also refused to abide by or approve the action taken, which consisted, among other things, in rescinding the former action of the committee in the selection of a temporary chairman for the forthcoming State convention, the person previously selected having announced his intention to deny roll calls and to decide questions in accordance with his personal preference.

Nobody but the impulsive governor had any notion that there was likely to be disorder at the State convention, nevertheless the local armory, where the convention was to be held, was found on the morning of the convention to be under guard by a detachment of police and militia ordered there by the governor. Difficulty was experienced in securing admission, but a formal demand having been made by the State committee, they were finally admitted only to discover that not only had the governor guarded the doors with his soldiers, but that his political adviser, the chairman of the State committee, had intrenched himself in state on the rostrum, protected by the strong military arm of the State.

The members of the central committee called upon the chairman to call them to order, but he refused to play, and they were obliged to select another chairman for the transaction of business. The soldiers, to their great relief, having been called off, the doors were finally opened, and the delegates and others were admitted, as at national conventions, by card. The chairman of the central committee finally consented to call the meeting to order. The secretary then reminded the chairman that the State committee had selected, as they had the right to do, a temporary chairman. This chairman assumed the chair, and the call for the convention was read. Meanwhile the chairman of the State committee was still attempting to act as temporary chairman of the convention. Among other things, he declared one Baker elected temporary chairman. In order to settle the matter the regularly appointed temporary chairman ordered a roll call on the election of Mr. Baker. There were yeas 67, nays 818.

Pursuing the tactics that have become familiar in connection with these cases, the chairman of the State committee and a few others proceeded to make all the disturbance possible and succeeded very well indeed. However, the convention went on with its work, committees were appointed and reported, four roll calls were had, with a majority vote of from 900 to 975 in each case and a minority of not to exceed 21 in any case. For a considerable time the State chairman, still claiming to preside, occupied one end of the platform and, with a few others, made all the noise possible. Finally this disturbing element left the hall, taking not to exceed 200 of those claiming seats in the convention of over 1,000. These bolters claim to have elected the contesting Roosevelt delegation.

The committee on credentials of the convention gave abundant opportunity for the hearing of contests, but the contestees from the two counties from which there were contests, Calhoun and Wayne, did not submit their cases. Had the Roosevelt claimants from those counties presented their cases and been seated the Taft people would still have been in control of the convention by a good majority. There were troubles in the county conventions in these two counties. In Calhoun County the Roosevelt people created such a disturbance that it was with the greatest difficulty that the convention transacted its business. In Wayne County the Roosevelt manager, who was not a delegate to the convention, and a few others, not to exceed 45, gathered in one part of the hall and created a perfect bedlam by shouting and gesticulating, and finally left the hall. After the row had subsided the convention transacted its business in an orderly way, elected its delegates, and adjourned.

The Taft delegates from Michigan were seated by the national committee without a roll call. The Roosevelt contestants did not take the trouble to include the case in the list of cases to be appealed to the committee on credentials, and yet the Taft delegates from Michigan were among those designated as having been stolen.

THIRD OKLAHOMA.

On the morning of the day fixed for holding the district convention in the third Oklahoma district, a meeting of the congressional committee was held at which each of the 19 counties composing the district were represented by committeemen or proxies. The question of the right of W. S. Cochran to a seat in the committee and to act as chairman, which he proposed to do, was questioned, he having moved from one county into another and both counties claiming other representatives. This, and the fact that the chairman refused to allow the committee to pass upon the question of its own membership, but insisted upon arbitrarily recognizing or refusing to recognize proxies, resulted in a resolution being offered to declare the position vacant. There is no question but what 11 members of the committee who were present in person voted for this resolution. Whereupon Cochran announced the committee adjourned until 1.30 p. m., though according to the terms of the call the convention was to meet at 11. After making this announcement, Cochran and a few others walked out of the committee meeting and the committee continued its business by electing officers, making up a temporary roll, and so forth. At 11 o'clock the convention met in the World Building, the temporary roll was, in due course of business, made the permanent roll, delegates favorable to Mr. Taft were elected, and the records of the convention, including the credentials of all the county delegates, were properly certified by the officers of the county organizations and transmitted to the national convention.

Cochran called a convention at the opera house. This convention had no regular credentials from the counties. Testimony before the national and credentials committees was that this so-called convention had no real organization and was largely made up of idlers and curiosity seekers. This case was so plain that the national committee did not have a roll call, and the testimony before the congressional committee left absolutely no doubt as to the regularity of the Taft delegates.

SECOND TENNESSEE.

The second Tennessee was one of those districts in which it is claimed that the Taft delegates were fraudulently seated. This is the district so ably represented on this floor by Hon. RICHARD W. AUSTIN, who has been twice elected to this House as a Republican. When the district convention met on March 9, there were contests from five counties, two of which had been instituted through a misunderstanding of the facts and were abandoned. When the committee on credentials was appointed the contestants from the other three counties declined to submit their cases to the committee and organized a bolt. The convention proceeded to do business in a regular way and elected two Taft delegates to the Chicago convention, regularly elected Roosevelt delegates from two counties remaining in the convention throughout its entire session. Some bolters also held what, being devoid of a sense of humor, they were pleased to call a "convention." Realizing later that their action was in the nature of a political joke, they resurrected the tattered remnants of an old organization which had been fighting Mr. AUSTIN and making his election as a Republican Congressman difficult. This outfit called another convention, at which only part of the counties in the district were in anywise represented, and elected as Roosevelt delegates to the convention two men who had participated in the election of delegates to the former regular convention. It is very clear to the dullest understanding that the men so elected were not entitled to seats in the Republican national convention.

NINTH TENNESSEE.

The two Taft delegates from the ninth Tennessee district were among those claimed to have been improperly seated, although the Roosevelt delegates and their attorneys thought so little of their case that they practically abandoned it before the credentials committee.

There are two organizations in this district, both claiming to be regular, both of whom named congressional candidates two years ago, and each organization held district conventions. At the head of one is the State treasurer elected by a Democratic legislature. The chairman of the organization supported the Democratic candidate for governor in 1910. This organization, on March 26, held a convention at which it elected delegates instructed for Taft. Later, on the theory that 30 days' notice had not been given of the first convention, they held another convention, again without proper notice, and elected and instructed the same delegates for Roosevelt, having in the meantime, possibly owing to the advent of missionaries from the North, changed their minds with regard to the candidate.

The other organization, which had been recognized as regular by the State committee in the election of 1910, and whose candidate for Congress received a considerably larger vote in that year than the candidate of the rival organization, held an orderly convention, after due notice, and elected delegates instructed for Taft, which delegates were seated, as above stated.

TEXAS.

The contest over the eight delegates at large from the State of Texas is the only one heard before the committee on credentials all of which I did not hear. It came after a long night of hearings, and I was absent while a part of the testimony was being taken. The main facts are, however, undisputed. Texas has a primary law under which parties casting over 100,000 votes must act. In 1896 and in 1900 the vote of the Republican Party was large enough to bring it within this law, but under the incubus of the Federal officeholding machine, of which Col. Cecil Lyon has been the head, the Republican vote has steadily dwindled. The Republican vote was 167,000 in 1896, 121,000 in 1900. Roosevelt received but 51,000 votes in 1904. Taft did some better in 1908, with a vote of 65,000, but the Republican candidate for governor of the Lyon officeholders' machine in 1910 received but 26,000 votes. Having manipulated matters in the interest of his officeholding clique so that the Republican vote was too small to require primaries, Col. Lyon was able and did control affairs in a way to deprive the majority of the Republicans of the State of control of the party and place it, or attempt to place it, in his own hands.

Of the 249 counties in the State of Texas there are 9 which did not cast a single Republican vote at the last election and 32 which cast less than 10. The average of the Republican vote in 99 counties was less than 23. No bona fide primaries or conventions or gatherings of any kind to elect delegates to the State convention were held in any of these counties. Postmasters friendly to the Lyon machine sent bogus proxies to Lyon and his officeholding henchmen for the purpose of enabling them to control the State convention. The minority of the committee on credentials of the national convention admit in their report that 40 of these counties were not entitled to representatives in the State convention.

When the State committee, dominated by Lyon's Federal officeholders, met for the purpose of making up the temporary roll of the State convention, a Mr. Elgin attempted to keep from the temporary roll these counties in which there had been no regular election of delegates, and though they were temporarily omitted they were finally placed upon the roll. No provision was made whereby contesting delegations could get into the convention hall, and it was made clear that the Lyon machine, through its postmasters' proxies from prairie dog counties, proposed to control the convention to the exclusion of the representatives of the party in counties having Republican organizations and a respectable Republican vote.

In this state of affairs delegates representing more than a majority of all the counties in which there were Republican organizations assembled in convention at Byers's Opera House, in the city of Fort Worth. This convention transacted its business in detail and in an orderly manner in sessions lasting nearly all day, and elected delegates to the national convention pledged to Taft, which delegates were seated by a vote of 35 to 18 by the national committee and by a majority of over two-thirds by the committee on credentials. If one had the time many well-authenticated instances could be recited in which Mr. Lyon, who practically controlled the appointment of 2,800 Federal officials, and those who worked with him deliberately conspired with Democrats to defeat Republican candidates. The sad state of the party in Texas and its dwindling vote is eloquent of the effect of his tactics. His effort to control the party in the State by proxies which represented nobody but possibly a single Federal officeholder is characteristic of the high-handed methods of piracy from which the party has been relieved by action of the national convention.

TEXAS DISTRICTS.

The contests in the second, fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and fourteenth Texas districts were either decided unanimously by the national committee or by a viva voce vote, and they were abandoned before the committee on credentials.

In the first district the Roosevelt delegates were elected by a bolting convention which did not represent a tenth of the votes, the bolters being all Federal officeholders.

The Roosevelt delegates from the second congressional district were elected at a meeting of six men held behind locked doors in the mayor's office in the city of Nacogdoches, as stated by an affidavit furnished by the mayor. All of these men had participated in the regular convention which had previously elected the Taft delegates.

FOURTH TEXAS.

In the fourth Texas district the small delegations from four of the five counties were contested. In this district, as in other parts of Texas, the Lyon organization endeavored to prevent negroes from participating. The district convention which elected the Taft delegates constituted a clear majority of the regularly elected delegates.

FIFTH TEXAS.

At the district convention in the fifth Texas district, the chairman, after having unsuccessfully attempted to deprive the counties of their just representation, left the hall. A new chairman was elected, committees were appointed and reported, and Taft delegates were elected to the national convention. Later the Roosevelt men held a meeting at which they elected delegates.

SEVENTH TEXAS.

When the district convention of the seventh Texas met in Galveston, certain persons claiming to be delegates from three unorganized counties insisted upon having their names placed on the temporary roll. As none of the counties had been legally organized, and the parties had no credentials, the committee making up the temporary roll declined to place them thereon, whereupon they organized a rump convention and elected Roosevelt delegates to the national convention.

EIGHTH TEXAS.

In the eighth Texas the Roosevelt people controlled the executive committee, but the Taft people controlled the convention, and adopted a minority report, whereupon the Roosevelt people bolted.

NINTH TEXAS.

In this district the district committee met at the call of a Mr. Speaker, a member of the committee, the chairman having refused to call the committee together to make arrangements for the district convention. At the meeting a letter was read, which stated that the State chairman had concluded that district conventions were not necessary, that the district delegates might be elected at the State convention. The committee did not take this view, and a convention was called for May 15. After this call was issued, the chairman of the district committee changed his mind, and, with a minority of the committee, called a convention on May 18. The convention first called was regularly held, with delegates from 12 of the 15 counties of the district, and elected delegates pledged to Taft. The latter convention was not called in time to give the notice required by law and was slimly attended. It elected Roosevelt delegates.

In the fourteenth Texas district there was a dispute over the control of the executive committee. Certain Federal officials claimed the right to act, which was denied, and the temporary roll of the convention was made up, and as thus made up the Taft men had a considerable majority. There was a contest over Bexar County, the largest county in the district, but it was clear that the Taft delegates were elected by a large majority. The convention elected delegates instructed for Taft by a considerable majority.

WASHINGTON.

The "roll-purging" resolution included the eight delegates at large from the State of Washington and the six delegates from the first, second, and third districts. The contest over the delegates at large hinges primarily on the delegation from Kings County, which includes the city of Seattle. A variety of methods were employed for selecting delegates to the State convention. The first county to act was Ferry, and delegates favoring Roosevelt were selected by the county central committee, as had been the usual practice in the State. Later, in Stevens and Walla Walla Counties, Roosevelt delegates were selected in the same way. From Franklin County a delegation was selected by the county committee instructed for La Follette. In Whatcom and Skaggit Counties Taft delegates were elected as the result of a primary agreed to by all parties. In some counties Taft delegates were selected by county committees.

Mr. WARBURTON. I understood the gentleman to say that it was the usual custom for the county central committee to elect.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true.

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MONDELL. That was the testimony before our committee.

Mr. WARBURTON. That never has been done except in one instance, and that was when we were nominating judges two years ago.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman from Wyoming ask my colleague from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] if he is not mistaken when he says that has not been the custom with reference to selecting delegates to a national convention.

Mr. WARBURTON. I am not mistaken on that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WARBURTON. There was a primary law in force from 1905 to 1909 which prohibited anything of that kind.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] says there is a State primary law which prohibits it. The people who were upholding his side of the case before the committee swore by the great horn spoon that there was no primary law under which they could elect these delegates, and that was their excuse for having a soap-box primary.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is true, too.

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman from Wyoming misunderstood me.

Mr. MONDELL. That was their excuse. They said there was no such law.

Mr. WARBURTON. I did not make any such statement. I say that from 1905 to 1909 what is known as the Hicks primary law was in force, which prohibited the election of delegates in that manner, and in 1909 a primary law was passed which repealed——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. From Franklin County, where the delegation was for LA FOLLETTE, the delegation was selected by the county committee for LA FOLLETTE. In Whitman and Skagit Counties Taft delegates were selected by a primary that everybody agreed to. Being small counties, nobody objected to them, and they were so elected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly.

Mr. NORRIS. That was in the same State where you objected to the primary on account of there being no law to control it?

Mr. MONDELL. I am in favor of legal primaries, and there is no objection to an unofficial primary anywhere where everybody agrees to go into such a primary, but no one should be compelled to go into an unofficial primary.

Mr. NORRIS. Would there be any way to punish a man who voted illegally in that primary? Does not every objection that the gentleman made to Kings County, where there was no primary, apply to this?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Why not apply the same rule?

Mr. MONDELL. I do apply the same rule, but the gentleman from Nebraska does not. I believe in the rule of the people, and if all the people want an unofficial primary, they have a right to have it. The very fact that all agree to it evidences a state of affairs in which the vote will be honestly cast and counted, but no set of thieves and gangsters have the right to rob the people of their franchise by insisting upon a soap-box primary against the will of the majority. That is my opinion.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly.

Mr. COOPER. Did I understand the gentleman to complain a little while ago about the epithets "thieves and robbers" being used by the Roosevelt people? Did not the gentleman just a moment ago himself characterize the people of Washington as thieves and scoundrels?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not, as the gentleman well knows, if he was listening, but I am very glad that the gentleman has called my attention to my use of a word I did not intend to use even under just provocation. I apologize to him and to the House for using the word thieves, even in the most general way. I certainly do not want to put myself in the class of those who have been using these epithets, and it was only because of my righteous indignation, as I thought of the outrages on the ballot that were proposed, that the word was wrung from my lips.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to.

Mr. WARBURTON. Does the gentleman agree to the fact that the county central committee of King County——

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I have not reached that, Mr. Chairman, and the gentleman from Washington, I know, is well informed as to the facts, and if he will kindly allow me to make my statement I am sure he can make his in his own time. The gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from Nebraska have the advantage of other gentlemen, for they seem to have a copy of my printed manuscript, and therefore know in advance what I am going to say.

Mr. WARBURTON. I understood the gentleman to say that he did not believe in soap-box primaries when ordered by the county central committee.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not say anything of the kind. If the county central committee is clearly authorized by the people composing the party to call a primary, and do so, they are within their rights. Minorities on county central committees may do very wicked things, and it was a minority of the legally elected committee in King County which called the primary.

The policy of confusing the situation by contests, which was so characteristic of the Roosevelt people everywhere, was practiced extensively and apparently with premeditation in this State. A contest was started by the Roosevelt people in a majority of the counties which were carried for Taft, and in this way a majority of the delegates to the convention was contested.

There was the same practice, whether it was in Washington or Alabama or Georgia or Arkansas—muddy the waters, lay the foundations for bolts, mislead the people through "psychological" contests—and if they did not win denounce in the most unbridled language the representatives of a great party, which, under the providence of God, has been one of the immortal instruments in the establishment of liberty, the furtherance of justice, and in the uplift of humanity. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have time in which to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent was given for one hour. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], who has charge of the bill before the House, insisted that he should not take over that time.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I trust that the gentleman will allow me to conclude. It will not take over 30 minutes, and I ask for that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to continue for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. In Washington the county committees are composed of precinct committeemen elected at primaries in September of even-numbered years. A majority of the committee so elected in King County appointed a central committee with full power to act for the full committee, and this committee selected the delegates from King County to the State convention and the county committee approved this action. It so happened that the municipal authorities of Seattle had redistricted the city after the election of committeemen in September last and created 131 new precincts. When in April, after the action I have above referred to, the county committee assembled they found present 131 persons who claimed to be members from the new precincts by appointment from the county chairman. The same committee under the same chairman had in a similar case decided that the appointment of such additional members by the chairman was illegal, and it undoubtedly was.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly.

Mr. WARBURTON. Is not that the custom and the practice of the State for the chairman of the county central committee, when a new precinct is divided or a vacancy occurs, to appoint the new committeeman?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if there is any State in the American Union that has any provision of law under which a man holding no official position at all can appoint 131 elective officers, that State needs to modify its statutes. Of course, there is no such power granted in any American Commonwealth. These were not vacancies; they were elective offices that had never been filled because the time for filling them had not arrived.

Mr. WARBURTON. On the contrary, is it not the ordinary rule everywhere?

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, as I have stated, this very committee, under this very same chairman in a former case when the same question had been raised, had held that the chairman had no authority to appoint, and he never questioned that judgment. There is no question about it.

The chairman did attempt to appoint 131 elective officers. Certainly I do not have to argue with the House of Representatives of the American Congress as to whether that kind of thing is warranted by any law anywhere.

It is claimed that the county committee, increased by the presence of these new appointees, ordered a primary for the election of delegates to the State convention, but a majority of the legally elected members of the committee made affidavit to the effect that they did not authorize the primary. No attempt was made to hold this primary in accordance with law or with legal safeguards. It was purely a soap-box affair. It was held in conjunction with the Democrats favorable to Wilson and at the same time and places.

The officers—if such they could be called—who were present at the primaries were appointed by the Roosevelt managers in the county and were responsible to no one. No outrage that could have been committed on the ballot would have been punishable. Repeating or stuffing the ballot boxes would not have been even a misdemeanor. Those in charge of the ballot boxes were at liberty to make up such returns as they saw fit. In view of these facts the Taft Republicans were exhorted not to attend the primaries or participate in them in any way, and they did not do so to any extent. There are between seventy and seventy-five thousand Republican voters in King County. At the close of the primaries the local papers announced that about 3,000 votes had been cast. The tally lists and ballots were not filed with any public official, and the Taft people never had an opportunity to see the alleged returns until they were filed with the national committee, when it was claimed that 6,900 votes had been cast for Roosevelt and 500 for Taft. In 30 precincts no votes whatever were cast.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Mr. WARBURTON. You do not dare to, because here is the morning paper reporting it by precincts.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the papers may or may not have been accurate.

Mr. WARBURTON. This is by a Taft paper.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Washington insists on interrupting me, I am perfectly willing to call his witness in this case and will accept the witness if he will. I said a moment ago that at the close of the primaries the local papers announced that about 3,000 votes had been cast, but the tally lists and ballots were never filed with any public official, and the Taft people never saw the alleged returns until they were filed in the contest with the national committee, at which time it was claimed that about 7,400 votes in all had been cast—6,900 for Roosevelt and 500 for Taft. Now, the gentleman from Washington insists on my accepting the statement of a morning paper published the morning after the primaries, which he says reports the election by precincts.

I happen to be informed with regard to the article which, I understand, the gentleman refers to. It was printed in a pamphlet of the records of proceedings of the Washington State convention filed with the national committee. The paper is the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, and Herman W. Ross, the reporter who furnished the copy, furnished an affidavit to the effect that he received these returns of the gentlemen who were managing the primaries on behalf of Roosevelt, who gave them to him as being correct. The article is quite long and purports to give the votes for Roosevelt and LA FOLLETTE by precincts, but does not give a single vote for Taft in the precinct tabulation. I will accept the gentleman's witness if he insists upon it. The opening statements of this article are as follows:

FACTION PRIMARY IN KING BRINGS OUT SMALL VOTE.

No judges in many precincts and no polling lists to check voters—Some boxes are empty—In the entire county there are cast only 2,810 for Roosevelt and 1,530 for LA FOLLETTE—Wilson Democrats poll 649; CLARK gets 226.

The factional primary held yesterday by the Roosevelt and La Follette Republicans and the Wilson Democrats was notable for the lack of interest displayed by the voters. Every effort had been made to attempt to poll a large vote so as to indicate the popularity of the three presidential candidates in King County.

Complete returns received last night from 214 out of 281 city precincts and 9 of the country precincts showed that from a total of 100,000 voters of King County 2,810 went to the polls to express a choice for Theodore Roosevelt, 1,530 voted for LA FOLLETTE, 649 Democrats voted for Woodrow Wilson; and 226 for CHAMP CLARK.

Although the supporters of William Howard Taft refused to recognize these primaries arranged under the sole supervision of Roosevelt and La Follette leaders as lawful and legal, and in spite of the fact that the King County Taft Club and the King County executive committee had sent out thousands of letters urging Republicans not to participate in these primaries, Mr. Taft received a total vote of more than 400.

It will be noted that the total vote for Roosevelt and LA FOLLETTE, as stated by this article, is 4,300, which is over 3,000 less than the number of votes which it was claimed had been cast when the Roosevelt contestants filed their contest in Chicago.

Mr. WARBURTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman said a moment ago that there were 75,000 Republican votes. I want to call his attention to the fact that at the last election with the full vote—Democrats, Socialists, and everyone in the city of Seattle—there were not 55,000 votes cast.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know anything about that, but I remember very distinctly seeing a registration list by precincts of Seattle alone, made in 1912, totaling more than 74,000 names.

The filing of numerous contests by the Roosevelt people created a condition hitherto unknown in the State of Washington, and to meet it the State committee met in advance of the convention for the purpose of hearing contests and making up a temporary roll. There was a determined effort to intimidate the committee, but it was not successful. The contests, including the one from King County, were all heard, and the temporary roll made up by a vote of about three to one.

After the temporary roll had been made up there were rumors that the Roosevelt people proposed to storm the convention hall with their numerous contesting delegations. Failing in that it is clear they intended to hold a rump convention, for they had hired a hall and gathered their forces there. In order to prevent the storming and packing of the convention tickets were issued to delegates and visitors. As soon as the Roosevelt followers found they could not pack the convention they retired to the hall they had previously hired and held a separate convention, at which the contesting Roosevelt delegates were elected.

The regular convention transacted its business with a majority of the duly elected delegates in attendance. The contest from King County was not presented to the committee on credentials. The committee adopted the temporary roll except as to the delegates from two counties, and as thus amended it became the roll of the State convention which elected eight Taft delegates.

The State convention recessed for the purpose of allowing the three district conventions to be held, and Taft delegates were elected from each of the three districts.

As I have stated, the Democrats favorable to Wilson held a soap-box primary in King County in conjunction with the Roosevelt Republicans and at the same time and place. The Democratic State committee refused to seat the delegates thus named and seated, as the Republicans did, a delegation appointed by the county committee. The Democratic convention at Baltimore took the same action. The action taken by both parties was the same.

VIRGINIA.

The motion to unseat 92 Taft and seat 92 Roosevelt delegates included all of the delegates from Virginia. As I have stated, all these contests were so utterly frivolous that they were entirely abandoned. The alleged convention at which the contesting delegates were said to have been named were in every case held more than two months after the regular convention. These mushroom conventions sprung from the fertilizing activities of a Roosevelt agent from the North, heretofore referred to. There was only one vote in the national committee in favor of seating these delegates. None of the cases were appealed to the credentials committee. A colored Republican from the fifth district asked for a hearing, but the statements he made related to happenings four years ago. It should be remembered that these wickedly frivolous contests represented one-fifth of the alleged "stolen" delegations, and it is on such infinitely and maliciously frivolous contests as these that the most astounding charges of fraud and corruption have been hurled at the convention of a great political party.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Possibly some of those present may have some knowledge of the manner of the election of delegates to the national convention from the District of Columbia. A primary election, agreed to by all parties and participated in freely by Republicans of all factions and surrounded by all possible safeguards, was held. The returns were made to an election board named by the national committee and showed that the Taft delegates received 2,966 and 2,964 votes respectively, as against 1,846 and 1,148 for the Roosevelt delegates. A lot of general charges were filed, none of which were substantiated, while the regularity of the election of the Taft delegates was abundantly proven. The contest was a mere bluff. The national committee seated the Taft delegates by a viva voce vote. The case was never carried to the credentials committee, though the contesting Roosevelt delegates were in Chicago at the time. This is a fair sample of the alleged "theft," which some men are making the basis of an excuse to desert the candidates of their party.

COMMITTEE ACTION.

The majority of the committee on credentials made written reports to the national convention on every contest submitted to them, giving in detail their reasons for the action taken in every case. Beyond a formal protest, filed with every case, against certain gentlemen, who were members of the national committee or from States in which contests had been brought, serving on the committee, no detailed reports or statements were made by the minority except in the following cases: Ninth Alabama, four line protest in fourth California, fourth North Carolina, Texas, and Washington. In the last two cases the minority did not agree as to facts and signed two reports. It was claimed as an excuse for this failure to state reasons why the Roosevelt delegates should be seated that the minority did not have time to prepare reports. They certainly had as much time as the majority. What they lacked was not time but facts to support their contention. It is easy to make unwarranted assertions and to hurl offensive epithets, and these, and not facts have been relied upon to support these flimsy contests.

It will no doubt be urged that the fact that members of the national committee favoring Col. Roosevelt in a large number of cases voted against the seating of the Roosevelt contestants is evidence of the fact that they were entirely fair-minded and should be an argument in favor of their judgment in those cases in which they did vote to seat the Roosevelt delegates. I have no disposition to detract from any credit that may be due these gentlemen, but these hearings were public; all the world had access to the facts. The cases in which they voted to seat the Taft delegates were so clear and the contest of the Roosevelt delegates so flimsy that no man having the least regard for public opinion could have voted otherwise. In those cases where there was the slightest excuse for a difference of opinion they voted for the Roosevelt delegates invariably. In the cases before the credentials committee practically every avowed Roosevelt adherent voted in every case for the Roosevelt delegates, even in cases like the Indiana delegates at large, where the vote of the national committee had been unanimous.

OTHER CASES.

This I believe concludes the list of "tainted" seats. There are a number of other contests I should like to refer to if I had the time, particularly the case of the Indiana delegates at large.

Although the national committee had decided this case unanimously in favor of the Taft delegates, the committee on credentials was asked to take it up, and for more than three hours in the middle of the night we listened to declamations in regard to it.

I am now prepared to say I do not think there are many people who possess the nerve to argue a contest like this in the first instance. I know of but one man who would repeat the infliction.

INDIANA.

The contest in Indiana was based on alleged fraudulent voting in a lawful and properly safeguarded primary in the city of Indianapolis, and though general and sweeping claims of fraud were made in the manner truly characteristic of the Roosevelt contestants in all the cases, only three specific acts of illegal voting were charged out of 7,643 votes, of which Taft received a majority of 4,683.

The bringing of such a contest ought to subject those who bring it to the scorn of all right-thinking men, and yet Col. Roosevelt, if I recollect rightly, thundered right vigorously about the outrage committed by the Taft people in this case. No doubt he was imposed upon in this and other cases by those who claimed to know, in which event should we not have heard a retraction when he discovered the true situation?

RUMPS AND RIOTS.

One who has looked into the history of the contests before the Republican national convention can not help being impressed with the striking similarity of the methods employed in widely separated localities. Given a certain state of facts—for instance, a clear minority in a county, a district, or State convention—and the same procedure followed, whether it was in Washington, Michigan, or Alabama.

The stage was set in advance for a bolt or a riot, or both, by a plentiful supply of contests, and where the affair was in cool and practiced hands the entire procedure, including reports of committees that were never appointed, were made up beforehand. The procedure was so uniform everywhere that one is forced to the conclusion that it was all part of a deliberately planned and carefully executed scheme of campaigning.

REAL PRIMARIES AND SOAP-BOX PRIMARIES.

I can not close this statement without a word about primaries. It is superfluous to say that the ideal condition under a free government is one under which the people can express their will as directly as possible in the selection of those who are to serve them in official capacity. To accomplish this laudable purpose the direct primary has been quite generally adopted. The success of the direct primary depends entirely on whether it is properly safeguarded. If it be of such a character that the voters of one party can, through it, nominate the candidates of another it becomes a diabolical instrument for defeating the will of a majority of the people.

If, on the other hand, a procedure is had in the name of a primary around which no adequate safeguards are placed, at which repeating, ballot-box stuffing, the making of false returns, can be carried on with impunity, with scant chances of detection and no means of punishment if detected, the whole system of primaries will be brought into disrepute. We all know that in the case of a serious contest the ballot box must be guarded with the utmost care to prevent it being used to thwart rather than reflect the will of the people. Such soap-box primaries as were attempted in Maricopa County, Ariz., and King County, Wash., would, if allowed to become general, seriously menace and finally destroy the primary system.

The attempt has been made, and no doubt will be made further, to mislead people into believing that the general attitude of the majority of the national and credentials committees was hostile to legal primaries. Nothing is further from the fact. In the fourth California case the contest was between delegates claiming to be elected at the same primaries. In no other case was the right of delegates elected as the result of a legal primary contested by the Taft people. On the contrary, the Roosevelt people challenged the overwhelming verdict of a legal primary in the case of the Indiana delegates at large. Not a single delegate elected to the national convention as the result of a legal primary lost his seat on the contest of a delegate otherwise elected. The result of legal primaries—that is, primaries held under sanction of law—was invariably respected.

CONCLUSION.

As admitted by the Roosevelt managers themselves, they started out deliberately at the beginning of the preconvention campaign to create contests. A large number of these contests were pure fiction, the contesting delegates claiming to be elected at conventions which, if held at all, were held a month or two after the regular conventions. Many of the contests which arose at the time conventions were held were the result of prearranged bolts based on the flimsiest pretexts. The great number of cases of conventions in which a disturbance was created, and the uniformly violent character of the same gives ample ground for the belief that it was part of the general plan of the Roosevelt managers.

Leaving out of consideration the contests admitted to be fictitious and "psycological," and coming down to the cases which were finally relied upon to support the claim of fraud, the facts in regard to them are as follows:

The Taft delegates from the ninth Alabama were entitled to their seats if the truth of every contention of the Roosevelt men were admitted.

The six Taft delegates at large from Arizona would have been elected just the same if the Roosevelt men had presented their contentions to the uncontested delegates to the State convention.

The Taft delegates from the fifth Arkansas were elected at the duly called convention held in the district; the other convention was a joke.

The Taft delegates from the fourth district of California had to be recognized or else deny the people of a district the right to elect their own delegates.

The Taft delegates from the thirteenth Indiana were elected at the only convention held in the district; the contestants were the product of a riot.

In the seventh and eighth Kentucky districts the Roosevelt delegates were the product of rump conventions, held because the Taft men had clear majorities in the regular conventions.

In the eleventh Kentucky district both sides sinned and each side was given one delegate.

The Michigan contest could only have been brought by men unable to realize the burlesque character of a procedure in which one-tenth of a convention attempted to control its deliberations. The bolters are now painfully divided between Wilson and Roosevelt.

The Taft delegates from the third Oklahoma were regularly elected at the district convention. The Roosevelt delegates were named at a small, select, unofficial gathering called as an afterthought.

The Taft delegates were elected at the regular conventions in the second and ninth Tennessee districts; the Roosevelt delegates were products of outfits which have been engaged for years in harassing Republican candidates.

The Taft delegates from Texas represented the large majority of the Republicans of the Lone Star State; the Roosevelt delegates represented the paper proxies from the prairie-dog counties held by Federal officials and patronage bosses.

A soap-box primary in Kings County, Wash., was made the excuse for a rump State convention by the Roosevelt people; the Taft delegates were elected at the regular convention. The soap-box primary was disposed of in the same way by both the Republican and Democratic conventions.

The action of the Republican national convention in the seating of delegates was correct, just, and equitable. Any honest jury having the facts before them would have decided the contests in the same way.

The proposition that electors on the Republican ticket in States which expressed a preference for Mr. Roosevelt shall, after having received the support which their position on the Republican ticket assures, cast their vote for the candidate of a third party has its alleged excuse in downright and persistent prevarication, on which rotten foundation it lays its proposal of treasonable larceny.

No one is justified in condemning the action of the Republican convention on mere hearsay, as has been largely done, and to be informed is to be convinced there is no ground for criticism. The convention acted honestly and in a spirit of fairness, in harmony with party history and for the best interests of the party and the American people. The violence of the attack on the party integrity has temporarily misled many good and well-meaning people, but the truth will triumph, the party be vindicated in its action, and its candidates elected. [Applause.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, to begin with, I desire to ask unanimous consent to print as a part of my remarks some statements to which I shall allude during the course of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asks unanimous consent to print certain statements as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, one of these statements that I shall print in the RECORD was prepared by Mr. Sackett, a delegate from the State of Nebraska to the Chicago convention, and a member of the committee on credentials in that body.

I have submitted the statements that he has prepared to a member of the national committee who heard all the contests and all the controversies that were brought before that committee, and I have been assured by that man, a man whose name would be recognized by every man in this House, that the statement of Mr. Sackett is absolutely justified in every particular, and that he might even have gone further.

This statement, so far as it pertains to the State of Washington, was submitted to Judge Epperson, of Nebraska, a gentleman whom I have known for years, who heard the contests as to Washington and has examined all the evidence, and it has his approval.

I submitted, in substance, the statement of Mr. Sackett pertaining to a part of the contests from Washington, Texas, and Arizona to a man whose name, like that of the other gentleman, would be recognized not only here but all over the country, and who examined all the evidence and reported to me that the statement was practically correct, and that in his judgment there were nearly 50—I think he put it at that figure—or 48 delegates in the Republican convention that were taken away from Roosevelt and given to Taft—legally elected delegates unseated and illegal ones put in their places, without any excuse, without any reason—and that no man could reasonably reach any other conclusion from an examination of the evidence; and that he thought that 25 or 30 more were cases where honest men, reasonable men, examining the evidence, could honestly come to different conclusions as to the results.

I have examined everything pertaining to these contests that I have been able to get hold of, and have read everything that has been printed by those who have examined them—everything that I have been able to get—and I unhesitatingly say that I do not see how any reasonable man can examine the contests in Washington, California, Arizona, Texas, and some other States without coming to the conclusion that they were absolutely stolen in that convention. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to admit, to begin with, that honest men——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment. That honest men may listen to the same evidence and come to diametrically opposite conclusions, so that I am not going to charge any man with dishonesty because he does not agree with me in the conclusions that I have reached. I am responsible to my own conscience in my investigations, and I concede to every other man the same right.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not pretend to know anything about the facts, but I want to ask the gentleman this question. The gentleman spoke of some gentleman of very high standing who had passed upon the cases, as I understand, in the State of Washington. Is the gentleman going to give the name of that authority?

Mr. NORRIS. The authority I have mentioned I can not give. I can not give his name. I have mentioned two men whose judgment has been given to me whose names I can not use.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. NORRIS. I will anticipate the gentleman's question. I admit that that detracts from the force of the argument, but it does not detract from the effect it has on me, because I know the men. One of these men whom I have mentioned, whose name is familiar to every Republican in the United States, is supporting Taft to-day. He explained—no, I will not say he explained, but I gathered it from his conversation—that he had political aspirations of his own, and that while he thought it was downright stealing, yet he believed that the best thing for him to do under all the circumstances was to go on and recognize Taft as the party leader.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks it fair, in view of the fact that he has said that the gentlemen, known throughout the country, have assured him to the effect that the delegation from the State of Washingon was stolen, that he should not give his authority?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is fair. I have told the facts. I admit that it would not have as much weight with me as though the authority were given, and I assure the gentleman that I would be glad if I could give the name, but there are men all over the United States who feel the same way. [Applause.] These men are not coming out in public and telling their opinions, because they are afraid of the persecutions that would come to them, occupying certain positions as they do, on account of the political machine and the political faction that is now in power.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks it is fair to come in and quote authority of that kind when he knows in advance that he will not be permitted to give the name? Why does not the gentleman give the facts without quoting some one whom he will not name?

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to give the facts before I get through. I am talking about these statements that I intend to print, stating what the facts are. I have been trying to investigate to find out what was the actual fact in every case in order to satisfy my own mind.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman ought to state it, and not call upon an authority that he can not quote.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to state it, if the gentleman will hold himself in peace and give me time, and I will not take two hours and a half to do it, either.

Mr. Chairman, as a Republican I submit to Republicans and to citizens of the country that if I come to the conclusion that a nominee in my party has been given the nomination by fraudulent, dishonorable means, it is not only my duty as a citizen, but as a member of the Republican Party, to denounce it and to denounce it openly. [Applause.]

TAFT'S MAJORITY ONLY 19.

Mr. Taft's alleged nomination was obtained in Chicago by a majority of 21. Bear that in mind. Two of those came from Massachusetts, and it is admitted that if there had been a roll call in which the Roosevelt men were voting those two men would have voted and their alternates would not have been allowed to vote. So, regardless of what we may think about the ruling of Chairman ROOT, those votes ought not to be counted, because if there had been a real contest, it is admitted even by the Taft fellows that Taft would not have received those two votes. So Mr. Taft's majority was 19. If, therefore, 19 delegates were placed on the roll of that convention by fraudulent, dishonorable, or illegal means, then Mr. Taft's nomination is tained with fraud. It is null, it is void, and is entitled to no consideration from anybody. Fraud has vitiated contracts from the beginning of civilization, and fraud ought, and at least in a moral sense does, vitiate a nomination, even though there is no law that can control national conventions.

PRIMARIES.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has had considerable to say about soap-box primaries. I wanted to ask him a question, but he would not yield so that I could. The question would develop this fact, that wherever the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in his two and one-half hours of laboring could find a place where some Taft delegates were elected at a primary, he told us about it. I was going to ask the gentleman the question, and I think the record will show that in no instance where there was a primary did they refuse to give the Taft delegates the vote of that primary and give Mr. Taft the benefit of whatever advantage that might be. And I think the reverse is true, that in every case where there was a primary which elected Roosevelt delegates that primary was called a soap-box primary, it was called fraudulent, and it was said that there was no law controlling it, and that they had no way to tell what the honest vote was. They talk about the primary in Indianapolis being an honest primary because Taft won out there. Oh, that was a virtuous affair. I remember meeting a Member of this House the day after they held that primary, and he said, "Taft got a great big majority in Indianapolis and I am sorry that the Republicans thought it was necessary to stuff the ballot boxes down there, because they did not need to. We could have beaten the Roosevelt fellows without it."

The Indianapolis papers announced that there was fraud there. I am not claiming anything for Indianapolis. I am not going to try to take it away from Taft, because I do not know how much fraud there was there. The vote was given to him and I have no knowledge to claim to the contrary, and hence I am not finding fault with it. I refer to it only to show how the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] loves a primary when it goes for Taft and how he hates it and despises it when it goes against him.

In the State of Washington there were primaries that went for Taft. The gentleman from Wyoming takes the pains to mention that here. There was no contest over them. Nobody is claiming that they ought to be taken away from Taft. Everybody has conceded that those counties ought to be given to him; but he repeated it over and over, "Oh, here was a primary away up there in the country that went for Taft."

But down in King County, in the same State—and I suppose they did not have a different law in one part of Washington from what they had in another—there was a primary that Roosevelt carried. I wanted to ask the gentleman, but he would not permit an interruption, whether anybody has ever made any charge before his committee or elsewhere that there was one single fraud committed in that primary? The newspapers of Washington had no record of it afterwards.

The gentleman says that anybody might have gone in there and voted at that primary, that anybody could have voted and there would have been no law to punish him. The same thing is true in all of the other primaries that went for Taft, but they were virtuous. On the other hand, nobody has ever claimed that any illegal vote was cast there, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] did not even claim it. It is conceded by both sides that if King County, in Washington, were given to the Roosevelt delegates, then they had a large majority in the State convention. But I am going to demonstrate to you that even if you give King County to the Taft delegates, there are three other counties that are just as meritorious, if not more so, than the King County proposition, and every one of them had to be given to Taft to save Roosevelt from having control of that convention.

WASHINGTON.

In the Washington State convention there were 668 delegates. Half of that number would be 334, and a majority would be 335. There were in the State convention of Washington, and it is uncontroverted by the Taft people, 263 uncontested delegates for Roosevelt and 97 uncontested ones for Taft. There were two counties—Pierce and Clallam—in which contests were decided by the Taft State committee in favor of the Roosevelt delegates. These two counties had 69 delegates. These 69 delegates added to Roosevelt's 263 uncontested delegates gave him 332 delegates, just 3 delegates short of a majority. I am now going to consider the contested cases from four counties: Asotin County with 6 delegates, Chelan County with 10 delegates, Mason County with 8 delegates, and King County with 121 delegates. It will be observed that if Roosevelt was entitled to any one of these delegations, he would have had control of the Washington State convention, even though all the others had been given to Taft. I shall show, and I think conclusively, that the Roosevelt delegates in every one of these counties were honestly, lawfully, and fairly elected and entitled to seats in the convention. The State committee, however, unseated all of the Roosevelt delegates from these counties, and without any reason, and absolutely contrary to the evidence, seated the Taft delegates.

The call for the State convention permitted the county committees to select delegates themselves if they wanted to, and it permitted them to call a convention to select delegates, or to call a primary for the selection of delegates. Any one of those methods was allowable and legal, and all were pursued in different parts of the State. Some of the delegates were selected by a committee, in some instances for Taft, and in some instances for Roosevelt. Some were selected at conventions and some at primaries. Both sides agree that any one of these three methods, if agreed upon by the county committee, would be lawful under the call and under the laws of the State of Washington.

ASOTIN COUNTY.

In Asotin County, pursuant to a call, a county convention was held and 6 Roosevelt delegates elected. The county committee consisted of 11—1 from each precinct. Three members of this committee, without any call or notice, together with 2 other persons not pretending to be members and not even pretending to hold proxies, appointed the 6 Taft delegates that were illegally given seats in the State convention.

CHELAN COUNTY.

In Chelan County, where they had 10 delegates, a convention was called in the regular way, and nobody disputed it. They met in convention and elected a temporary chairman. There were 55 delegates in the convention. There were three contests from three precincts. The temporary organization was formed and a committee on credentials was appointed. This meeting was in the forenoon, and it was participated in by Roosevelt men and Taft men. They adjourned until 1 o'clock to let the credentials committee report on those contests. After they had adjourned, and during this recess, a minority of the convention met secretly in a room and selected delegates to the State convention and instructed them for Taft. At 1 o'clock, the hour of reconvening, the convention again assembled. The report of the committee on credentials was heard. It was acted on in the convention. They elected delegates to the State convention and instructed them for Roosevelt. The Taft State committee seated the Taft delegation. They had to, because if they had not it would have given a majority in the State convention, according to their own figures, to the Roosevelt delegates.

MASON COUNTY.

In Mason County there are 21 precincts. No county convention was held, but there were two delegations, one for Taft and one for Roosevelt. The county committee consisted of 21 members, 1 from each precinct. At a meeting of this committee, at which 11 members were present, a delegation to the State convention was elected and instructed for Roosevelt. The Taft contesting delegation was selected by two members of the county committee without any call or notice of meeting. The State committee seated the Taft delegation, because it was absolutely necessary to do so in order to control the convention for Taft.

Any one of those counties, if decided properly, would have changed the result in the Washington convention, according to the figures of the Taft people themselves.

KING COUNTY.

Now we come to King County. That is the county where Seattle is located. The gentleman from Wyoming had a great deal to say about the soap-box primaries there, and one of the arguments he uses is that in the same primary there were Democrats selected. That is, the Democrats held a primary at the same time and elected their delegates, and they were contested, and the Democratic convention threw them out. That only illustrates what I have so often contended here and elsewhere, namely, that the Democratic machine and the Republican machine are one and the same. They are oiled from the same oil can; they drink out of the same canteen. But if it is a good thing to follow Democratic precedents, then why does not the gentleman from Wyoming follow it in California? A Republican committee threw out California, but the Democratic committee did not. The gentleman from Wyoming has much to say in favor of Democracy. In fact, the action of those committees in Chicago was all in favor of Democratic success. They have done more to bring about the possibility of Democratic victory than the Democratic Party ever did or ever was competent to do. The gentleman from Wyoming compares the Republicans of Pennsylvania with the Democrats of Missouri, and he shows in the comparison how much better the Democrats of Missouri are than the Republicans of Pennsylvania. There was unanimity between the Taft Republicans and the Democrats that has been noticeable. In this House, when the Republican convention was on in Chicago, and the committees were stealing a whole lot of votes, no one on earth felt better about it than did the Democrats in this body.

In the confidence of the cloakroom they would speak out their feelings, and it was always one way. There is a unison between the Taft Republicans and the Democrats. I think it is conceded, confidentially at least by all Republicans, that Taft can not possibly be elected and that his running on a trumped-up nomination can only result in Democratic votes for the Democratic candidate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I congratulate those Republicans who have so often condemned me and others because I have associated with Democrats that at last they are and have been doing from the very beginning just exactly what the Democrats want them to do. The Taft Republicans and the machine Democrats are together. They are "two souls with but a single thought; two hearts that beat as one." They are all working for Democratic success. But, Mr. Chairman, to return to King County.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Would it not be more plausible instead of believing Taft Republicans and Democrats were working together that the Democrats should believe in the old maxim that when thieves fall out and fight honest men will get their dues? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the Democrats who confidentially told what they thought in the cloakrooms of this House did not state that. They were shivering in their boots for fear Taft would not be nominated and they were trembling in their shoes for fear Roosevelt would. The facts are, when the Democratic convention met at Baltimore the man you selected as temporary chairman and who was supposed to make the keynote speech devoted all of his time to an attack on Roosevelt and paid no attention to Taft. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is another evidence of this fusion and unison. Everybody knows the fight is between Roosevelt and Wilson. Let us now return to King County. Now, King County was entitled to 121 votes—121 delegates. The city of Seattle, on account of a large increase in population and according to the law of that State, had to be redistricted, and in the redistricting there were 131 voting precincts added.

There were in round numbers something like 250 members of that county committee at the time; and the chairman, according to the custom, that has had no exception as far as I know, filled these vacancies by appointment. The committee met under the call of the State convention. I have never heard, and the gentleman from Wyoming did not seriously contend, that the chairman did not have the right to fill those vacancies. So the committee met and determined to have a primary, and they called it. No one denies but what under the call of the State committee they had the right to call the primary; and in that primary 6,900 Republican votes were cast. Taft got about 500 and Roosevelt got most of the balance—practically all the balance. Now, they state this is an illegal primary. Let us see what the contrary is. The majority of this committee authorized a call of the primary. They had authority to do it under the call from the State committee. How did the Taft delegates get a showing? Let me tell you. In the campaign preceding—the year before—there was an executive committee having charge of the campaign. At this meeting of the central committee, where this primary was called, a resolution was passed doing away with that executive committee. Its functions were performed; it had no further authority anyway, even if they had not passed that resolution; but they passed the resolution discharging the committee. What happened? When they called this primary 14 men out of these 22 members of that old committee got together without any notice, without any publicity, and without any authority, and selected 121 men to go to the Republican State convention, and that is the authority of the so-called Taft delegation which went from King County. Now, let us see. Suppose you say that the primary was illegal. There is no legality in 14 men selecting a delegation. They had no more authority to select those delegates than I had. It was absolutely a nullity. I do not think and I do not believe any reasonable man can reach the conclusion that the so-called Roosevelt delegates selected at the primary were illegal; but even if you believe that, you must admit that the Taft delegates were illegal.

Which one then in justice should be recognized, one selected at a primary open and above board against which no man has said there was anything illegal or wrong or dishonorable, where the Republicans could come out and vote, and about 8,000 of them did come out and vote, or to recognize a delegation of 121 men, selected by 14 men, who simply took it upon themselves to do it, and who had no authority whatever.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In regard to King County and Whatcom County——

Mr. NORRIS. I simply yielded for the gentleman to ask a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It will be but a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to take up two and a half hours, but I am perfectly willing to yield for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will make it a question, and I will make it short. King and Whatcom Counties are two of the largest counties in my district. You contend that the primary should have been held in King County; why was it contested in Whatcom County?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not contest it——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Roosevelt men did.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not help that. I am not here defending anything that is wrong because it was done by Roosevelt men any quicker than I will fight it when it is done by Taft men. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In Whatcom County they held the primary by agreement——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And the Roosevelt people were defeated, and two or three weeks after they convened——

Mr. NORRIS. And the contest was dismissed; they never got the vote, and Taft did, and properly so. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Washington did not state that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They met by agreement, and the Roosevelt people refused——

Mr. NORRIS. And contested it, and they went to the committee and the committee turned the Roosevelt people down; and I am not objecting to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was the Taft people who turned them down.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it was, and they did right. That is a case where they did right. They stumble on that once in awhile, but not often. When the Roosevelt men institute a contest that is wrong they ought to be defeated. In the cases the gentleman mentions the Taft delegates won. They were given the seats, and I am not complaining, and as far as I know no one else is finding fault.

They say, "Why, here is a contest down in Louisiana; it had nothing back of it, nothing to give it any foundation, and we decided it against Roosevelt. And," they say, "even the Roosevelt men on the committee voted to decide it against Roosevelt." That is commendable of them. They were honest. They were not there to steal. They were there to do right. But the argument of those who defend the robbery at Chicago is that because they found a contest instituted by Roosevelt men to be without merit, therefore they were justified in deciding all contests against the Roosevelt delegates, without regard to merit.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to finish up this question first.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to ask the question whether he thinks the argument of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] was any more unfair than to quote some man as being high authority——

Mr. NORRIS. I will not go over that now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Let me finish my question.

Mr. NORRIS. I know what the gentleman is going to say, and I have admitted to the gentleman that his criticism is just. I know it is; I acknowledge it. I would be as glad as the gentleman would be if I could give the name of every authority I have cited——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You already have it, saying that he was an honest man, that you could not mention it because he did not want it known, and that he was supporting Taft because he wanted to get into office.

Mr. NORRIS. If everybody who is supporting Taft because he either has or expects to get an office is dishonest, then Taft's honest supporters will be reduced so that you can number them on the fingers of your hand.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yet you quote them to support your case.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman can ask me a question, but do not make an argument.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If I can ask a question without having any more noise about it than necessary, I would ask you if you did not quote here as evidence——

Mr. NORRIS. I know what the gentleman is going to say, and I have been over it and I have stated it repeatedly. Now, the gentleman ought to be courteous enough to let me go on. I know what the gentleman is going to say——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You know what I am going to say, and that is the reason you do not want me to ask it.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman has already asked it once, and I have gone over it and explained my position.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You have not permitted me to ask it yet, and the reason is that you know what I am going to ask. It is 120 miles away——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from Washington, if I am interrupting him——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not interrupting the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman is talking aloud here. If I annoy him, I apologize for it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman need not get disturbed.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not disturbed. I wanted to give the gentleman a free rein if he wanted it.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for order. I want to hear this discussion, and can not hear two of them at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is clearly out of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman from Nebraska will keep still——

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going to keep still. I have taken the floor for the purpose of doing otherwise. That is my privilege.

Now, then, I was asking the question, I believe, what would be a fair-minded man's duty with these two propositions, one delegation selected at a primary where 7,000 Republicans participated, and there were 6,500 votes for one set of delegates, and another delegate was selected in secret by 14 men without any authority? That is the case of King County.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Is there any great distinction in theory between 14 men selecting 121 delegates and 1 man selecting 131 and permitting them to call a primary?

Mr. NORRIS. It depends altogether on the authority of the 1 and the authority of the 14. If the 1 had the authority, his action is right.

If the 1 man had authority to do what he did—and in this case I do not believe anybody seriously questions it—then his action was legal. If the 14 men selected delegates and had no authority whatever to do it, then the delegates they selected had no title whatever; the action was entirely illegal. This, it is true, is a technical view of the situation; but, be as technical as you will, you can not find any excuse or any authority for the selection of the Taft delegation of 121 men from King County. But for a moment let us lay aside technicalities and take a broad view of the situation. The question of authority is important, but what did the people who were given authority do after they received it? Suppose the appointments by the chairman to fill these 121 vacancies be considered absolutely illegal. After this appointment by the chairman gave to these precinct committeemen their power, what did they do with it? They turned it all back to the rank and file of the Republican Party. They, in connection with the old members of the committee, called a primary, so if any power had been given to them illegally their first official act was to surrender it back to the party. It seems to me the most technical man could not complain, and even if you honestly believe that the chairman had no right to fill these vacancies it must nevertheless be admitted that the filling of them by the chairman resulted in nothing further than to give the people belonging to the Republican Party an opportunity to control that party. If these men were given power wrongfully, it must at least be said in their defense that they did not abuse, they did not even use it; they surrendered it all back, giving every Republican of King County an opportunity to be heard and to have his influence felt in the contest.

On the other hand, what can be said of these 14 men? They were members of a committee of 22 who had charge of the campaign the year before. Their duties were fulfilled; their functions had been performed; they had nothing further to do. Even though no resolution had been passed discharging them, they would have had no power to select a delegation to the State convention, but before they ever attempted to exercise such a function or to pick delegates the committee passed a resolution formally discharging them. Notwithstanding this, 14 men, who in the year preceding had constituted part of the committee to manage the campaign, got together in secret and selected 121 delegates from King County to the State convention. Here was an exercise of power by men who had no authority. Contrast their action with the action of the committee in calling the primary. They took away from the people all power and assumed it all unto themselves. They were opposed to giving the Republicans of King County an opportunity to select delegates to the State convention. Of course their real reason was that they knew in a primary Taft delegates would be defeated. They assumed that they knew what was better for the Republicans of King County than the Republicans did themselves, and so with their superior wisdom, without a vestige of authority, without any reason or without any right, they relieved the Republicans of King County of all responsibility and selected 121 delegates.

The Taft delegation from King County was seated by the State committee. As I have already shown, Roosevelt only lacked three votes of a majority of the State convention, as shown by the figures of the Taft fellows themselves, so it was necessary that this entire delegation, in the words of the Texas manager, should be "captured." The gentleman from Wyoming has criticized this primary because there was not a larger vote cast. He makes the statement that there were 75,000 Republican voters in King County. The gentleman is, of course, mistaken in this assertion, badly mistaken. The official records of the State of Washington show that at the last congressional election the Republican candidate for Congress, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] received in King County 16,082 votes. In round numbers there was actually cast at this primary 8,000 Republican votes. This is not a bad showing, and demonstrates, I think, that a reasonably large percentage of the Republican vote was cast at that primary. At least, it seems to me fair to say that, waiving all technicalities and all other considerations, it would be better to let 8,000 Republicans of King County select a delegation to represent them than it would be to let 14 men, meeting in secret, do the selecting.

In the last congressional election the official records show that in the whole State of Washington there were only 79,003 votes for the Republican candidates, only a few more than the gentleman from Wyoming claims for King County alone. There is another important piece of evidence that will have a bearing on the size of the primary vote in King County. I understand the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Republican member of this House, who represents the district in which King County is located, was nominated the last time he ran for Congress at a primary, and it is interesting to note that the first-choice vote by which the gentleman carried King County was 9,588, practically the same Republican vote that was cast in this despised primary that elected Roosevelt delegates to the State convention. Surely the gentleman from Wyoming would not ask our colleague from Washington to resign because he was nominated at a primary where there were so few votes cast. Surely he would not go so far as to even hint at the legality of the title to his seat here because in his own home county these 75,000 Republicans that the gentleman from Wyoming says live there forgot to come out and vote at the primaries.

Later on, in my remarks in connection with my discussion of the power of patronage, I will have something further to say in regard to the State convention of Washington, and will show how the trick was done and by whom it was performed.

CALIFORNIA.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there were two delegates from California that were stolen. The State of California through her legislature passed a State-wide primary law, a law providing for a primary for the election of delegates to the national conventions. That law provided that these delegates should be elected in the State at large. The law went into effect, and the Republican Party—both factions of it, all factions of it—and the Democratic Party and all factions of that accepted its provisions.

Not only was this law acted upon and respected and accepted by all factions, but Mr. Taft himself signed and filed with the secretary of state of California an official document that gave him the benefits of this law in the California contest. The law had a provision in it by which any candidate for President could file with the secretary of state his accepted list of delegates favorable to his candidacy, so as to give him the benefit of having his delegates printed on the ballot in a group and also to give his supporters in the State his official statement as to the delegates that he desired elected from the State to the national convention. Mr. Taft went into the contest and filed with the secretary of state of California his indorsement of 26 men whom he desired elected under that law as delegates to the Chicago convention. I have a certified copy of this document and it reads as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., March 26, 1912.

CHAS. M. HAMMOND, San Francisco, Cal.:

I indorse your selection of the following 26 candidates for delegates to the national convention:

(Here follow the names of the 26 Taft delegates.)

WM. H. TAFT.

Filed in the office of the secretary of state the 26th day of March, 1912, at 9 o'clock a. m.

FRANK C. JORDAN,
Secretary of State.

After going into this California contest and atfer Mr. Taft had specifically, over his own signature, accepted the benefits of the law, it seems to me that it comes with poor grace, after he had been defeated by an overwhelming majority, for anyone in his behalf to set up the flimsy excuse that the law of California should not be respected because it conflicted with a rule of the national committee. If it was the intention of the Taft men to make this contention, it would rather seem to me, in all honor and honesty, they ought to have made it before they went into the contest under the law and tried to get the delegation through the law. Mr. Taft is a lawyer of sufficient ability to know that from the beginning of civilization, his conduct in the contest in California would certainly have estopped him, or anyone in his behalf, from trying to nullify the State statute after he had been defeated in the contest and after he had accepted the provisions of the statute. It is a pitiable spectacle and not a very bright one to place before the rising generation to have the President of the United States go into a contest of this kind and specifically accept a law and then, after he is defeated, to see his supporters openly and defiantly nullify this law and setting up a rule of a political committee as a defense of their action. The case of the bosses at Chicago must have been desperate indeed if, in addition to going so far as to nullify the laws of a sovereign State, they should also put their own candidate for whose benefit they were perpetrating the robbery in such an unenviable and undesirable position before the American people.

The reasoning of the men who would follow the action taken at Chicago in nullifying the laws of the State of California would lead us to the greatest of absurdities. Suppose one of our States, Iowa for instance, decided to enact a presidential primary law. No one denies but what Iowa ought to have the right to do it. There is no inhibition in the United States Constitution to such action. All men of progressive ideas admit that every State ought to have such a law, but, disregarding the merits of the case, all men ought to be willing to admit that Iowa should be permitted to make whatever law she desired on the subject.

If the reasoning of the Taft people in Chicago is correct, the lawmakers of the Iowa Legislature, before they enacted their statute, would have to make an examination of the rules and regulations of the Republican committee and see that their proposed primary law would not conflict with the rules of this committee—a committee entirely outside of any law, a committee that is not governed by any law. And so the citizens of Iowa, before they could enact a law that would be workable and entitle their delegates to admission to a national convention, would have to consult the edicts and the rules of this committee. Suppose they did this and enacted their law in accordance with the national committee's rules, what assurance have the people of Iowa that, even before their law can go into effect, the national committee will not meet and pass other rules and regulations that would nullify their law. The national committee, controlled as it has been controlled in the past by the political machine, being opposed to the election of delegates by primaries, because in that way it takes away their power, would be able to nullify any and every law that any or every sovereign State of the Union might pass. What a spectacle it would be for the governor or a committee of the legislators from Iowa to go to Chicago or to Boston or to New York to consult the political bosses and find out from them whether they had in contemplation any change in the rules of the national committee in order that the sovereign State of Iowa might be assured that these self-constituted political bosses would not nullify and abrogate any law that Iowa might pass.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. KENT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is aware of the fact that at the time this law was passed the Republican organization of California was hostile to President Taft and had absolute authority to elect all delegates hostile to him?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am aware of that fact. I myself, when that question was up in California, wired to some of the officials there, knowing that the progressives there had advocated a primary for delegates to the convention, and that they had obtained complete control of the Republican machinery, and under the law of California as then constituted they could have selected the delegates absolutely. They had it secure, and some people thought they ought to give the machine a dose of its own medicine and select delegates in that way. I urged them to pass a presidential primary law. The progressive Republicans of California, in control of the legislature, and, notwithstanding the fact that they also had control of the Republican machinery and could have named every delegate to the Republican convention, passed a State-wide primary providing that the delegates should be elected by the people of the whole State. The Roosevelt delegates were elected by about 77,000 plurality over the Taft men. Nobody disputes that. Each of the delegates received a certificate of election and went to Chicago. But when they came to Chicago the national committee threw out two of those men and put in two Taft men.

It is claimed in the speech of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that this law of California conflicted with the order and the rule of the national Republican committee. Have we come to the position where any national committee, without any law to control it, without any power or anybody to control it, can pass rules that shall nullify the laws of sovereign States? Then it is time that we should know it.

Well, let us see what happened. They put on two Taft men in place of the two Roosevelt men that they took off. By what right did they put them on? Nobody had contested their seats.

Nobody had called any other primary or convention in any district or had made any protest whatever. No convention, no committee, nobody, had done anything in California to question the legality of every one of these 26 delegates who were elected by 77,000 plurality.

It is said, "Why, the whole State might have been thrown out." The facts are, Mr. Chairman, that this national committee wanted to establish a precedent by which it could nullify a State statute. If it is right and that precedent must stand, then in four years from now that self-perpetuating machine, the national committee, can nullify any law or statute passed in any of the States. It can, with the same authority and the same power, nullify the primary law in my State, which provides that delegates shall be elected by districts, and not in the State as a whole, as was done in the State of California. They can, the next time, make a rule that the only electors elected by a primary that can sit in a convention shall be those that are elected as they elect them now in California. The real purpose there is to make this machine self-perpetuating. They have robbed the Republican Party of their expression and their right to control the national convention now. They were only preparing, when they stole the two delegates from California, to commit the same crime again four years from now, and to establish a precedent for it.

Why, the gentleman from Wyoming said they could have taken the whole State. True enough; they might. They were all powerful. I could, on the same theory of the gentleman from Wyoming, and those who follow that theory, if I am arrested for stealing horses and I am brought to trial, offer as a defense that the barn out of which I stole the horse contained two horses and I stole only one; and on their theory I will not only be entitled to a verdict of not guilty for larceny, but I will be entitled to a legal title to the horse that I did steal. [Laughter and applause.]

TEXAS.

Now, I am going to take up the contests from the State of Texas. The State of Texas is a southern State, and the argument of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in favor of the Taft delegates from Texas is rather amusing. He shows that Federal officeholders down in Texas were overriding the Taft fellows and controlling conventions. Maybe it is true; but what is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander. If you will take away from Taft the delegates that came to him from the States where I believe they were absolutely stolen, and those from the South that came to him by virtue of patronage alone, he would not have a handful of delegates left. Everybody knows it. [Applause.]

In the State of Texas there was an open contest between the Taft followers and the Roosevelt followers which the entire country watched with considerable interest. Texas was the one southern State where the national committeeman of the State was opposing the administration and supporting Roosevelt. In that State practically all of the contests were brought by the Taft people. The State convention was controlled by the Roosevelt followers, and nearly every congressional district convention was controlled in the same way. The regularity that the gentleman from Wyoming claims on behalf of all the Taft delegates from the South is lacking in the State of Texas. As I said, the whole country watched the contest, and it was generally understood throughout the United States at the time that the Roosevelt men were successful. It did not dawn on the public mind for some time afterwards that the Taft people were industriously working up contest cases and making a determined effort to steal the delegation at Chicago. The man who had charge of the Taft campaign in Texas was H. F. MacGregor, and it must be said to the credit of Mr. MacGregor that he conducted his fight in a very open-handed way. He made no secret of the fact that those who were faithful and helped in the Taft cause should be rewarded in the way of patronage. He had two able lieutenants in his fight. One was a man by the name of W. B. Brush, of Austin, Tex., and the other was James W. A. Clark, of Corsicana. They issued definite instructions in writing to the Taft followers. They deliberately started out with a conspiracy to contest every convention that they could not capture. They tried to browbeat public officials and gave everybody to understand that those who were faithful would be rewarded and that those who supported Roosevelt would be punished. Later on in my remarks, when I intend to discuss at more length the question and the evils of patronage, I shall refer again to these men and read portions of their published correspondence.

It is sufficient to say at present that these subordinates were instructed by the Taft managers to contest every delegation that they could not control and to bolt wherever they were in the minority and elect a contesting delegation. In one of the letters the boss, in giving his instructions, used this language: "Capture if you can, but do not be captured." As will be seen in the examination of the evidence in the various districts of Texas, these instructions were carried out to the letter. Wherever the Taft fellows could not control the convention they always bolted; they always elected contesting delegations, and in Chicago these contesting delegations were always seated. Very seldom did they even attempt to give a reason for their bolt. Through all the contests of Texas very little, if any, evidence will be found of any irregularity on the part of the Roosevelt delegates, and in no case where a contesting Taft delegation was seated will there be found any evidence of regularity or legality of the Taft delegations.

Notwithstanding these methods, the State convention of Texas was controlled by an overwhelming majority in favor of Roosevelt, and most of the congressional district conventions were controlled in the same way. Texas was entitled to eight delegates from the State at large. The State of Texas has a law providing for the holding of the State convention, and the Republican State convention was called pursuant to that statute. Texas has 249 counties within its boundaries. There were delegates to the State convention from 208 of these counties. The original credentials of the delegates in these 208 counties were introduced before the credentials committee at Chicago, and no one, as far as I know, has denied or disputed their legality or validity. In the other 41 counties there were no conventions or primaries held and no representation from them either for Roosevelt or for Taft.

In the entire State there were contests in the State convention from 17 counties. The regular State committee, composed of both Roosevelt and Taft men, and by a unanimous vote, referred these contests to four subcommittees, and on each one of these four subcommittees were both Roosevelt and Taft representatives. After hearing the contests the subcommittees reported to the full committee the result of their investigations. The report of three of these subcommittees was unanimous and was approved by the full committee. In the other subcommittee there was a minority report filed by a Taft member, in which he differed from the Roosevelt members of the committee on only two counties, so that, as far as the State committee was concerned, there was a unanimous conclusion reached by both Taft and Roosevelt men on all the contests except from these two counties. Of the 17 counties contested, Taft delegates were seated from 4 counties and one-half of the Taft delegation from 4 counties, and the Roosevelt delegations were seated from 9 counties. The action of these subcommittees was approved by the whole committee by a vote of 28 to 2, and included in the 28 were 3 Taft members. The other 2 members gave notice that they would present a minority report to the convention as to these two counties, but, as a matter of fact, there was no evidence anywhere to show that any such minority report was ever presented. The report of this committee was unanimously adopted and approved by the State convention when it convened. In the entire State there were 27 counties that instructed for Taft, and 13 of these 27 counties remained in and took part in the State convention. The convention elected delegates and instructed them for Roosevelt by a majority of more than 10 to 1. No one anywhere at any time has questioned the regularity either prior to or during the State convention. There was no evidence whatever offered before the national committee or the committee on credentials that could possibly be construed to give any legality to the Taft delegation from Texas.

The Taft delegation was selected at a meeting that had no authority whatever. It did not even pretend to have any semblance of regularity. There could not have been present delegates from to exceed 14 counties. The meeting was held without any notice, without any call; in fact, it was a secret meeting. There was no roll call, no pretense at organization in the way of appointing a committee on credentials or otherwise, and no credentials were presented. No call of the counties was had.

Notwithstanding this, the Taft delegates from Texas were seated and the legally elected Roosevelt delegates were thrown out. In most of the congressional districts from Texas the work of the national committee and the credentials committee was as flagrant and unfair as it was in regard to the delegates from the State convention.

FOURTH DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

The fourth district affords a remarkable exhibition of the determination of the Taft managers to either rule or ruin. There are five counties in this district. There were contests presented from two precincts in two different counties, one from Collin and one from Grayson. The men presenting these contests had been denied admission in the county convention of the two counties mentioned. The convention was organized in the regular way, at the time and place provided for in the call, and four out of five counties, with regularly and lawfully elected delegates, took part. Delegates to the national convention were elected and instructed for Roosevelt. The delegates from the county that did not take part, at a later time and at another place, together with the men presenting contests from the two precincts mentioned, held a convention and elected Taft delegates. The evidence in this case discloses that there was no claim of irregularity, excepting from these two precincts. No one has denied at any time but what the Roosevelt delegates were regularly and lawfully elected; that they held their county conventions and the district conventions according to law and at the time and place name in the call, which was regularly and lawfully issued. Of course, it was necessary in Chicago to give the Taft men a control of that convention that some legally elected delegates instructed for Roosevelt should be thrown out, and I presume they considered they might as well throw them out from this district as from any other, and so the steam roller crushed the life out of the Roosevelt delegates and these Taft delegates were seated, who had no more claim and no more right to seats in the national convention at Chicago than they did at Baltimore.

FIFTH DISTRICT.

The fifth congressional district of Texas is composed of five counties. There were contests from three out of the five counties. It should be observed that in this district the congressional committee was controlled by Taft men, and the committee thus controlled decided the contests in favor of the Roosevelt delegates. The convention then went ahead and elected delegates in the regular way and instructed them for Roosevelt. Ellis County was one of the counties in this district. The delegates from this county were instructed for Taft, but remained in the convention and participated in its action. Notwithstanding this, the delegates from this county, together with the Taft delegates from one other county that had been denied seats in the regular convention, met together and selected a set of Taft delegates, and the national committee and the credentials committee at Chicago, following their usual course, gave these illegally elected delegates seats in the convention.

SEVENTH DISTRICT.

The seventh congressional district of Texas comprises eight counties. Six out of the eight were carried by Roosevelt, and the Roosevelt delegates had an overwhelming majority in the district convention. Two conventions were held. The delegates from the six counties held a convention and selected Roosevelt delegates. No question was ever raised anywhere as to the regularity of the delegates from these six counties. No one, so far as I know, has ever denied that their election was even irregular in the minutest detail, but notwithstanding this, the delegates elected for Taft by the two counties composed of only a small minority of the delegation were seated in Chicago.

EIGHTH DISTRICT.

In the eighth district of Texas there are nine counties. Six of these counties were carried by Roosevelt men and the delegates from the other two counties were in favor of Taft. The Taft delegates from these two counties bolted from the regular convention and held a rump convention, but the delegates elected by them were seated in Chicago with the usual regularity. No one has ever questioned the regularity of the convention in this district that was controlled by Roosevelt delegates, and no one has ever given any reason why the Taft delegates bolted and held a separate convention, excepting that they were unable to control the convention, and, as I shall show later on from printed letters of the Taft managers in Texas, the action of the Taft delegates in this district convention, the same as their action in the other Texas district conventions, was taken according to the written instructions of the Taft managers.

NINTH DISTRICT.

In the ninth district there were two district conventions. One was called by the regular congressional district committee through its chairman. A large majority of the delegates took part in this convention. At this convention Roosevelt delegates were elected. The other convention, which elected Taft delegates, was called by a man who was chairman of one of the county committees. He had no authority either under law or any rule or regulation of the party. The convention which he called was participated in by a minority of the delegates. In this district it was known before either convention met that a large majority of the delegates to the convention were for Roosevelt, and the Taft delegates therefore refused to meet in convention with the Roosevelt fellows, and according to instructions from the Taft managers they saw that they could not "capture" and therefore obeyed the command and kept out of the regular convention so they could not "be captured."

TENTH DISTRICT.

The tenth district of Texas comprises eight counties. No one has denied or disputed the regularity or the legality of this convention. After the convention met, however, the delegates from two counties and a part of a third county under the leadership of a United States internal-revenue collector and the postmaster at Austin, bolted and held a rump convention. This rump convention elected two Taft delegates and, of course, the national committee and the committee on credentials put them on the roll at Chicago.

FOURTEENTH DISTRICT.

In the fourteenth congressional district of Texas there are 14 counties. The congressional convention was called by the congressional committee. In this convention there was but one contest. The contest was compromised, and both the Taft and the Roosevelt delegates were seated, giving to each delegate one-half of a vote. When the Taft delegates in this convention discovered that they were in a very small minority and that they could not "capture" the convention, they bolted. The delegates from three of the counties, one of which was the county that was contested, left the convention and elected Taft delegates. The regular convention performed its function in due form and elected Roosevelt delegates.

I have thus far considered 22 delegates from Texas. I have considered only those about which, in my judgment, there can be no possibility of a doubt. You must remember, as I explained yesterday in my remarks, that if it be shown that 19 of President Taft's delegates in Chicago held their seats illegally and fraudulently then his nomination must of necessity be illegal, null, and void. These cases that I have taken up, from Texas alone, are sufficient to nullify Mr. Taft's nomination.

FEDERAL PATRONAGE.

The gentleman from Wyoming goes on to say that postmasters and Federal officeholders down in Texas controlled conventions and selected delegates. He goes on to show that under the control of the national committeeman down there the Republican vote has been falling off for four years. Well, it has been falling off everywhere else for four years. [Laughter.] The gentlemen down in Texas who represent the Republican Party are handicapped by what is in the White House just the same as we are everywhere else in Republican circles. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, if it is good and sufficient reason to throw a delegate out because of Federal patronage, let us see where the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will land.

There were at the Chicago convention over 200 delegates from States controlled absolutely by patronage. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] reminds me of Polonius. Hamlet, you know, took him out and showed him a cloud in the sky, and he said, "Polonius, that cloud looks like a camel." Polonius said, "Yes, my lord; it does look like a camel." "Oh, no;" said Hamlet, "it looks like a weasel." "Sure," said Polonius, "come to look at it right, it does look like a weasel." "Oh, no;" said Hamlet, "it is an elephant." "Why, of course," said Polonius, "anybody can see that it is an elephant."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It looked like a bull moose. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. It looks like a bull moose to all Democrats. The political boss takes my friend from Wyoming and shows him Texas. He says, "Here are the Roosevelt delegates down in Texas. They ought to be thrown out because postmasters helped to put them in," and the gentleman from Wyoming says, "Sure. Throw them out. We do not want any Federal patronage delegates in Chicago."

Then the boss takes him over to Mississippi and says, "Here is a delegation made up of Federal office holders and postmasters, all for Taft. They are all right." And the gentleman from Wyoming raises his hand to heaven and says, "Of course they are all right." [Laughter.] "They ought to stay." Then the boss takes my friend to Indianapolis and says: "Behold, here is one of the wonders of the campaign—a Taft delegation elected by a primary. We are for the people and this delegation must be seated." And the gentleman responds: "Wonderful discovery! Of course, they must be seated. The primary must be acknowledged." And then the boss takes my friend to King County, Wash., and to Maricopa County in Arizona, and he says: "Here are delegations for Roosevelt. They were elected by the despised primary methods. The primary must be killed." And my friend answers and says: "Sure the primary is an evil. It opens the door to fraud. These delegations are wicked and they must be thrown out."

Now, let us see about Mississippi. There are three or four men down in Mississippi who control the Republican Party. "Why," the gentleman from Wyoming says, "there were some counties in Texas where not a single Republican vote was cast." That is true, but those counties were not represented in that convention. He did not tell you that. He wanted you to think delegates were fixed up from those counties. They were not, however.

But there were places in the South where in the last election not a single Republican vote was cast in a Republican district, and those congressional districts were represented in Chicago by a couple of postmasters. He says that Col. Lyon, the national committeeman from Texas, helps the Democrats. I am not going to dispute it, because I know nothing about it. But over in Florida, where there were two delegates, enthusiastic Republicans for Taft, who went to Chicago with their expenses paid, I suppose, and return tickets in their pockets, who came from districts where not a single Republican vote had been cast. What did they do for the Democracy?

Well, Mr. Speaker, let us see. The Republican party in Mississippi is controlled by three men: L. B. Moseley, clerk of the court; W. O. Ligon, one of the United States marshals in one of the districts; and a man by the name of Fred. W. Collins.

Now, let us see about the delegates from Mississippi to Chicago.

L. B. Moseley, clerk of the Federal court, jury commissioner, United States commissioner.

M. J. Mulvihill, postmaster at Vicksburg, salary $3,100.

L. K. Atwood, ex-collector of internal revenue.

Then comes a private citizen. God bless him! How lonely he must have felt in that delegation. [Laughter.]

J. M. Shumperi, juror selector.

J. F. Butler, postmaster at Holly Springs, salary $2,200.

E. H. McKissack, juror selector.

Louis Waldauer, postmaster at Greenville, salary $2,800.

J. W. Bell, postmaster at Pontotoc, salary $1,500.

W. W. Phillips, professional juror.

W. J. Price, postmaster at Meridian, salary $3,200.

Then another juror.

J. C. Tyler, postmaster at Biloxi and solicitor of funds from Federal officeholders, salary $2,500.

W. P. Locker, janitor of Federal building, salary $900.

E. F. Brenner, postmaster at Brookhaven, salary $2,500.

C. R. Ligon, United States deputy marshal, and son of the marshal, salary $1,200.

Wesley Crayton, professional juror and jury selector.

What about this family that is controlling the Republican Party in Mississippi? I have read you the delegates to the Republican national convention of which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is so proud that there were delegates there not controlled by Federal patronage.

L. B. Moseley is the clerk of the Federal court. W. R. Moseley, a brother, is the collector of the port at Gulfport, Miss., with a salary of $3,000 per annum. R. O. Edwards is a foster brother and cousin and is postmaster in Jackson, with a salary of $3,300. Mrs. R. O. Edwards is assistant postmaster in Jackson, with a salary of $1,600. Thomas W. McAlpin is a brother-in-law, and he has a contract for carrying the mail. Miss Suzette McAlpin is a sister of Thomas McAlpin and is postmistress at Bolton, with a salary of $940. Frank L. Rattliff, another cousin, is a postmaster at Shaw, and he has a salary of $1,400. Then let us take up the Ligon family: W. O. Ligon is the United States marshal and he has a salary of $3,000 from the Federal Treasury. His son, C. R. Ligon, is a deputy United States marshal and gets a salary of $1,200. Jennie D. Ligon, the wife of W. O. Ligon, is postmistress at Gloster and has a salary of $1,500, Then there is Percy Ligon, W. O.'s son, who is assistant postmaster at Gloster, with a salary of $590.

Let us now take the other part of the trio, the Collins family: Fred W. Collins is United States marshal, with a salary of $3,000. W. A. Collins is a son of Fred and is postmaster at Hattiesburg, with a salary of $3,000. Seth W. Collins is an uncle to Walter and is postmaster at McComb City, at a salary of $2,300. Then there is J. N. Attkison, brother-in-law to Walter, who is postmaster at Summit, with a salary of $1,500. Walter Collins, son of Fred, also has a brother-in-law who is the postmaster at Tylertown, and he gets a salary of $1,500. F. W. Collins, jr., son of Fred, is deputy United States marshal and gets a salary of $1,200.

DATA RELATING TO ALASKA (S. DOC. NO. 882).

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to print certain data which I hold in my hand, with illustrations, relating to the commercial and productive importance of the Territory of Alaska. The matter has been accumulated by considerable effort and bears directly upon the resources and progress of that Territory from the time of its purchase from Russia in 1867. It is not voluminous, but it is illuminating and important, and should be preserved for future reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that certain data, with illustrations, relating to Alaska be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RAVAGES OF ARMY WORM.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before the close of the morning business I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry what are the prospects of a report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 18960), which is now in conference? I have a statement to make in reference to the bill, and that is the reason why I make the inquiry.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from South Carolina, I wish to state that there have been frequent meetings of the committee of conference and there will be another meeting to-morrow. Whether the conferees will then agree is uncertain.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The reason why I make the inquiry is that the gravest condition which has ever confronted the Southern States now confronts them. What is called the army worm has made its appearance and is devastating the grain and the cotton crops of that section. I am just back from the office of the Secretary of Agriculture. He says there is ample provision made in the agricultural appropriation bill for him to send experts into all those States to enable the farmers to combat this pest, but until it is passed he is practically helpless.

Only those who know the ravages of this insect can appreciate the gravity of the situation. The insect does not come very often, but this year has made its appearance, certainly a month sooner than usual, threatening perhaps the entire cotton crop, threatening the entire hay crop, and the corn crop of all the Southern States. The Secretary informs me this morning that it has made its appearance practically in every State, and that he is very anxious to have sufficient means to send experts into those several States in order to combat it right now in its incipiency.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, in view of that fact, that any differences which may occur in the conference committee might be expedited or held in abeyance for a year in order to meet the menace which now confronts the great commercial crops which come from that section of the country.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask the Senator if provision has not already been made by a bill pending in the House which will come to the Senate soon?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am informed by the Secretary of Agriculture that that is a mere bagatelle; that it might do for one State, but that he can not meet the emergency unless there is a special appropriation made, which would take time to pass both Houses, but there is ample provision in the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. As I stated to the Senator, there will be a meeting of the conferees to-morrow at half past 10.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then, if the remarks I have made will help to expedite the report of the conferees, it will be all right. Otherwise, I shall bring up this matter again, and see if there can not be some means by which we can meet the emergency which confronts the section I have reference to. I shall make no further remarks pending the meeting of the conferees to-morrow and the report they may see fit to make.

CLAIMS OF INJURED GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on yesterday, during my temporary and unavoidable absence, the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims, was passed by the Senate without a roll call. I had an amendment I desired to offer to that bill relating to a small matter, and I wish now to enter a motion that the votes by which the bill referred to was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed be reconsidered, so that the bill will not be sent to the House. I do not ask that the motion be acted upon now, but I merely desire to enter the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Missouri to reconsider will be entered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, July 25, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1913.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall confine myself in the observations I shall make this morning to what is known as the House bill for a revision of the duties on wool and woolens. I shall not attempt to discuss the amendment in the nature of a substitute which was introduced yesterday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], because I did not have an opportunity to see that amendment until this morning at about 10 o'clock, and I am not sufficiently familiar with its terms to take it into consideration in my discussion of this subject.

In the presidential campaign of 1908 the platforms of both political parties promised a revision of the tariff. That promise was made in response to a Nation-wide demand on the part of the people for relief against the unjust and oppressive tariff taxation imposed by the Dingley tariff law. Under the shelter of tariff protection many of the necessaries of life had been monopolized and the cost of living advanced beyond the income of the average man, and, in many instances, beyond the income of the well-to-do and moderately prosperous. In the election of that year the Republican Party was successful. It elected its candidate for the Presidency; it elected a majority in the House of Representatives, and it retained its majority in the Senate. It had control of the three branches of the Government.

Shortly after his inauguration, President Taft, mindful of the promise of his party to revise the tariff, called Congress together in special session for the purpose, as declared in his message, of carrying out that promise. In view of the fact that this platform promise was given in response to a demand of the people for relief from tariff burdens, the people had a right to expect that the revision would be one which would substantially reduce and lighten the burdens which had been laid upon them by the tariff act of 1897.

In this expectation the people were grievously disappointed. There was indeed a revision, if a slight reduction of duties here and a slight increase yonder, resulting in practically no change in the average, can be called a revision, but admittedly it was a revision which gave to those who had asked it no relief.

The act of 1909, slight as were the changes in duties taken as a whole, made no change at all in the woolen schedule, although the duties imposed in that schedule of the Dingley law were exceptionally excessive, unjust, discriminatory, and onerous.

The leaders of the Republican Party in this Chamber and the sponsors of the Payne-Aldrich bill had ample warning while that bill was under consideration that it would not be satisfactory to the people. Those of us, Mr. President, who were here during the long and fierce conflict over the Payne-Aldrich bill, those of us who heard that great debate, will never forget the great speech of the lamented Senator from Iowa, Mr. Dolliver, one of the greatest orators and leaders of the Republican Party, in denunciation of the iniquities of that measure and its betrayal of the promises upon which the Republican Party had secured continuance in power; will never forget the terrible arraignment and the merciless exposure of that act of treachery to the Republican Party and the people, and the arraignment against its injustice, its discrimination, and its wrongs to the people, made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], both lifelong Republicans and protectionists, who believe that protection should not be made a pretext for exploitation and robbery of the people.

I say those of us who heard these terrible Republican philippics against the authors of the Payne-Aldrich bill, against the iniquities of that bill, to say nothing about the powerful excoriations from this side of the Chamber laying bare the hollowness, sham, and pretext of the miserable business, will never forget the impression created in this Chamber and throughout the country. But notwithstanding the platform promises of the Republican Party, notwithstanding the message of the Republican President urging Congress to proceed to carry out that platform promise as the people had understood it, notwithstanding the appeals of those great Senators, representing the other side of the Chamber, speaking in behalf of the people of the great States of the Middle West—notwithstanding all of those things and those appeals—the Republican Party as constituted in this Chamber turned a deaf ear to the appeals of the people coming to them through those channels and heard only the appeals of the beneficiaries of protection.

The Republican Party was so obligated to the privileged classes, and its copartnership with the protected industries was so close that it dared not offend them, even to relieve the distress of the people, and the appeals and warnings of their champions on this side and on that side of this Chamber were unheeded.

As soon as the President had signed the bill the dissatisfaction which had been growing during its entire consideration in this Chamber and in the House broke forth from one end of the country to the other in a veritable storm of disapproval and condemnation.

It was not confined to section or to party. It was as broad as the country and as universal as the love of justice and fair dealing. And it was the prolific matrix from which sprang those dissensions in the Republican Party which culminated at Chicago a few weeks ago in rending that party in twain after a half century of almost unbroken ascendancy and solidarity and paved the way for the advent in our political life of a new party.

At the election of 1910 the Payne-Aldrich bill became the paramount issue. In that contest the Republican Party was overwhelmingly defeated and the Democratic Party was elevated to power in the popular branch of the Congress. The result of that election was a clear mandate and commission to the Democratic House of Representatives to proceed as speedily as it might to a revision of the tariff along the lines of Democratic thought and policy and principle as indicated in the practices and in the platforms of that party.

In April, 1911, President Taft called a special session of Congress for the specific purpose of considering the agreement which he had made with Canada with reference to reciprocity, an agreement, by the way, which I see the President is anxious to unload. In his message to the special session of Congress the President suggested that the Congress should confine itself to the passage of this particular measure.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House, aware of the oppression of the people through the tariff of 1909, recognizing the fact that the people demanded and had a right to expect as speedy relief from those onerous conditions as possible, recognizing the fact that the people of both political parties were tired of the delays and disgusted with the trifling of the Republican Party upon this question of tariff revision, as soon as it had concluded its consideration of the reciprocity pact, for which the session was specially called, ignoring altogether the dilatory recommendations of the President with reference to general tariff legislation, proceeded upon the lines indicated in the Democratic platform to select such schedules in the tariff as had been the subject of severest criticism and greatest complaint, such schedules as carried the most excessive duties and which were the least defensible from any standpoint, and following the Democratic promise of gradual reductions, presented to the House of Representatives certain schedule bills, including the one now before the Senate.

In the campaign of 1910 Schedule K was the most generally and the most vigorously attacked of any schedule in the Payne-Aldrich bill. And, Mr. President, I might say in passing that it was the most feebly defended of any schedule in that bill. President Taft himself had declared it indefensible. It only required an examination of the report of the executive departments of the Government dealing with the subject of foreign importations to show that a large part of the duties which this schedule carried were over 100 per cent, and therefore necessarily not only in excess of the difference in the labor cost here and abroad, but equal to the entire cost of production, including labor, material, and transportation from Europe to this country.

So the case of the people against the Republican Party and its tariff promises was made out by the records of actual tariff transactions, kept by the President's appointees and confidential advisers. Whatever might be claimed as to any other schedule of the Payne-Aldrich bill, there could be no doubt about Schedule K. It was manifestly not only too high, but, even from the standpoint of the Republican platform definition of protection, twice too high.

In view of these conditions, the Ways and Means Committee of the House, as soon as they could get rid of the reciprocity treaty, entered upon the consideration of this schedule, and after as thorough an investigation as was needed in fixing the rates, reported to the House, and the House passed, what is known as House bill 11019. That bill, Mr. President, while complying with Democratic promises with reference to tariff revision, was a moderate and a conservative revision. The duties fixed in it were such as would yield a reasonable revenue to the Government without imposing unnecessary burdens upon the people. It fairly met the demands of the people with respect to the duties on wool and woolens, and was satisfactory, therefore, to those who had asked for revision and in whose interest revision had been promised, and was unsatisfactory to nobody except those who for 40 years under and through Republican tariffs and resultant monopolies had exploited and robbed the people out of something like $50,000,000 annually, which ought, in all justice and fairness, to have remained in the pockets of the people.

In August, 1911, this bill, slightly modified in the Senate and agreed to in conference, passed both branches of Congress and was vetoed by the President. The President based his veto not upon the merits of the legislation, but upon the ground that the Tariff Board had made no report upon this wool schedule, and he did not know how much these "indefensible" duties should be reduced. For these reasons the President maintained that legislation upon this schedule must be held in abeyance, while the people suffered these indefensible exactions, until this board was ready to report. This suggestion of the President of the United States, conveyed in his veto message upon the wool bill passed at the special session of 1911, is the first suggestion in our history from the Chief Executive to Congress that Congress ought not to legislate, and would not be permitted to legislate, upon the most vital question affecting the material interests of the people—the question of how much tax they were to pay for the support of the Government and how much bounty they were to pay to the industries of the country, unless there had first been an investigation by an executive board, composed of members appointed by him, who bore no responsibility under the law and the Constitution with respect to legislation upon these questions.

Mr. President, that suggestion was not made in the campaign of 1910 either by the President, who, along with his party, was being attacked for his part in the sham and treacherous revision of 1909, or by the candidates of the Republican Party on the stump in any part of the country. In the campaign of 1910, when the tariff was the paramount question before the American people, no one authorized to speak for the Republican Party asserted that Congress must not and would not be permitted to legislate on the tariff until there had been a report of the Tariff Board.

I undertake to say here to-day that if the Republican Party had taken the position in that campaign which the President has since taken—which he and the leaders of that element of the party he represents now take—and had said to the people of the country, as they now in effect say, "However pressing your demands for relief from unjust tariff exactions may be, however much you may be entitled to what you ask, there can not be—and the Republican Party pledges itself that there shall not be—any revision of any schedule of the tariff until there has first been a report of the Tariff Board on the particular schedule complained of and attacked"; if the Republican Party had taken that position in 1910, as it does now—the majority polled against that party in that election, great as it was, would have been twofold greater.

Mr. President, Mr. Taft did not need—Congress does not need—the report of this board to determine whether the moderate revision made in the bill on wool and woolens was justified. The records and reports of the Department of Commerce and Labor of imports of wool and woolens for the years 1910 and 1911 showed that a large part of these duties were absolutely prohibitory, and as a result that there had been practically no importations of those articles.

The records of this department disclosed the fact that there were 27 items, covered by the bill, carrying duties in excess of 100 per cent—some of them 150 per cent, some 180 per cent, and some more—with a general average of over 90 per cent. Surely with these facts established by the official records it did not require a scientific investigation to ascertain whether the conservative reductions made in that bill could be safely made.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will first inquire whether the Senator would prefer to proceed without interruption?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would, if the Senator will permit me, and then later I would be glad to be interrupted.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire at some time convenient to the Senator to ask him a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not decline to yield, but, under the agreement, we must vote to-day, and there are quite a number of others who wish to present their views.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not be persistent at all about it. It was because we have only the day that I thought, in the interest of getting a general discussion, perhaps an interrupted discussion would be best. We will not have time for many set speeches to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. For that reason I am not making a set speech. I am trying to hurry through to make way for others who wish to present their views.

To get back to the thread of my statement, I repeat the President vetoed the wool bill we passed in 1911 because the Tariff Board had not made its report. At the beginning of the present session of Congress President Taft submitted the long-delayed tariff report on wool and woolens, and recommended that on the basis of the findings of the board Congress should proceed to a consideration of this schedule, with a view to its revision and a general reduction of rates.

The majority of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, after a careful analysis of the Tariff Board report, came to the conclusion that there was nothing in it which called for any change in any item of the wool bill passed during the special session of Congress. As a result, the House passed the bill which is now pending before the Senate, known as House bill 22195, and which is practically identical with the bill passed by it during the special session upon the same subject.

The subject embraced in Schedule K in the Payne-Aldrich bill, known as the wool schedule, has received such thorough and such detailed discussion, not only in both branches of Congress during the last four years, but throughout the country and in the press, that I do not conceive it necessary for me in presenting this bill on the part of the minority members of the Finance Committee to enter into any elaborate discussion of it. I shall content myself with a brief reference to its purposes and the manner in which it seeks to accomplish those purposes.

But it might be well before doing that to discuss briefly the history of wool legislation in this country and the Payne-Aldrich duties upon wool and woolen goods. The people who pay taxes on these products have had mighty little to do, during the last 40 years under the Republican Party, with the legislation imposing these taxes. In a very real and almost literal sense it has been dictated and framed by the beneficiaries of these taxes. After the war, when the Republican Party had committed itself thoroughly to the principle of protection, after a long controversy between the woolgrowers and the wool manufacturers as to what each should have in the way of Government bounty through the grace of the Republican Party, they finally composed their differences, because they had ascertained that party stood ready to give to each all they wanted, and they concluded that they could better exploit and rob the people through the tariff by working together than they could by working separately. When they had reached this conclusion, composed the controversies that had waged between them, and agreed between themselves what each should have, the Republican Party permitted them to have their agreement written into the law. There was no real legislation; the agreement of the woolgrowers and woolen manufacturers was simply affirmed and ratified.

That was nearly 40 years ago, when by consent and agreement between the woolgrowers and the wool manufacturers, with the assent and concurrence and cooperation of the Republican Party, this great industry actually wrote in the tariff laws of the country their private agreement as to what each one wanted in the way of tariff bounties, and there it has stood ever since with practically no change except while the Wilson Act was in force. For 40 years this great industry, protected upon an average on raw wool at 44 per cent and upon an average on manufactures of wool at 90 per cent, has been allowed to exploit and rob the American people at its will.

That law was brought forward by Congress in 1909 from the Dingley Act and rewritten in the Payne-Aldrich Act.

Mr. President, I think right at this point it would be well for me to state briefly the average duties, stated in ad valorem terms, carried in the present law and in the pending bill upon the subjects embraced in the 19 or 20 paragraphs covered in this short bill. I can do it in a few minutes. It will show better in a general way than any argument could the real merits of the complaint of the people against the present law and the extent of relief that will be secured to the people through the pending bill if it becomes a law.

The average ad valorem equivalent carried in the Payne-Aldrich bill upon raw wool embraced in paragraph 1 is 44.31 per cent. The average carried in this bill is 20 per cent.

On all noils, top waste, card waste, slubbing waste, and so on, embraced in paragraph 2, the average of the Payne-Aldrich bill is 38.96 per cent, in round numbers 39 per cent, and in the pending bill 20 per cent.

On combed wool, on tops and roving or roping, embraced in paragraph 3, the ad valorem of the Payne-Aldrich bill is 105.19 per cent and in the pending bill 25 per cent.

On yarns made wholly or in part of wool, embraced in paragraph 4, the Payne-Aldrich rate is 82.38 per cent; the rate in the pending bill is 30 per cent.

On cloths, knit fabrics, felts not woven, and all manufactures of every description made of wool, embraced in paragraph 5, the Payne-Aldrich duties are 97.11 per cent and in the pending bill the rate is 40 per cent.

On blankets and flannels, embraced in paragraph 6, the Payne-Aldrich duties average 95.57; the duties under the pending bill are 30 to 45 per cent, according to the value.

On women's and children's dress goods, and so on, covered in paragraph 7, the Payne-Aldrich duties are 102.85; the rate in the pending bill is 45 per cent.

On clothing, ready made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls, whether knitted or woven, and so on, embraced in paragraph 8, the Payne-Aldrich rate is 81.31; the rate in the pending bill is 45 per cent.

On webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, and so on, embraced in paragraph 9, the Payne-Aldrich rate is 87.06; the rate in the pending bill is 35 per cent.

On carpets, embraced in paragraph 10, the Payne-Aldrich rate is 62.09; the rate in the pending bill is 40 per cent. There are various kinds of carpets: I will not run through them all—but I have the average of the rates carried by the Payne-Aldrich bill on all of them, and the average carried by the pending bill, and I will give the general average. I think it is about 62 per cent in the Payne-Aldrich bill, and it is either 25 or 35—I do not now recall—under the pending bill. Mats and rugs are included.

Let us summarize. On raw wool the duties carried in the Payne-Aldrich bill, stated in ad valorem terms, average 44.31 per cent. The duties in the pending bill average 20 per cent. I am basing this upon the imports of 1910. On manufactures of wool the Payne-Aldrich rate is 90.1 per cent, while the average rate carried in the pending bill is 42.55 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention, because I can better illustrate in this way the character of the present law—its excessive and discriminatory duties, the unjust burden that it imposes upon the people, especially the poorer classes of people—to the duties on a few specific items in the present law. I give only a few of these simply for the purpose of illustration.

On wool and hair of the goat, and so on, advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond washed or scoured condition, not specifically provided for, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the specific duty in the Payne-Aldrich bill is 33 cents per pound plus 50 per cent ad valorem. In 1911 there was imported of these articles $19 worth. The duty collected was $33.90.

Think about that, Mr. President! During a whole year under this law of the items embraced in this paragraph there was imported only $19 worth, and the taxes collected at the custom-house and finally paid by the consumer amounted to nearly twice the foreign selling price of those articles with the transportation added from the point of shipment to the point of delivery in this country. The ad valorem equivalent duty carried on this item is 178 per cent. Of these articles, valued above 70 cents a pound, there was imported in 1911 only $111 worth. The duty collected was $83; the ad valorem equivalent was 74 per cent.

These figures show, Mr. President, that the duty on both grades was practically prohibitive, but their chief value consists in the fact that they emphasize the discrimination made against the coarser grades of these articles used for making the clothes of the poor people in favor of the higher grades used in making the clothes of the rich. The ad valorem duty is 104 per cent higher on the lower grades used by the poor than on the higher grades used by the rich.

Let us take one other item under the Payne-Aldrich bill—cloths, woolens, and worsteds—valued at more than 40 cents per pound and taxed 33 cents a pound, plus 50 per cent ad valorem. The importation of those articles in 1911 amounted to only $2,564, but the duties collected on them amounted to $3,835. Those, I repeat, are the cheap clothes worn by the poor people of the country. The ad valorem duty upon those cloths in the Dingley law is 149 per cent.

Let us take the finer grades of these same cloths, valued at above 70 cents per pound, out of which clothes worn by the richer people are made. The average ad valorem duty imposed on those by the Payne-Aldrich law is 91.94 per cent; that is to say, the duties imposed on the lower grades, the cheaper grades, of clothes, such as are used by the plain people, are 55 per cent higher than the duties which are imposed upon the finer grades of clothes which are worn by the rich.

Take blankets valued at not above 50 cents per pound. Upon those the average ad valorem duties under the Payne-Aldrich Act is 105 per cent. There was imported into this country last year only $800 worth of those goods, but the taxes on them amounted to $809.

Take the blankets of the higher grade, valued at more than 50 cents per pound; those are taxed at only 67.64 per cent, showing a discrimination against the blankets which the poor people buy in favor of the blankets which the richer people buy of 38 per cent.

Blankets more than 3 yards in length, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, are taxed at 33 cents per pound and 50 per cent ad valorem. The importations for 1911 were $185; the revenue collected was $311; the ad valorem equivalence is 168 per cent. The same goods valued at over 70 cents per pound are taxed at 44 cents per pound and 55 per cent. On basis of importations in 1911, the ad valorem equivalence is 102 per cent. The lower class of goods is taxed 66 per cent more than those used by the richer people.

Flannels for underwear, valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 50 cents per pound, are taxed at 33 cents per pound plus 35 per cent. Importations for 1911 amounted to $1; revenue collected was $1.08; the ad valorem equivalence is 108 per cent. The same goods valued above 70 cents per pound are taxed at 11 cents per square yard plus 55 per cent. Importations, 1911, amounted to $8,434; revenues derived, $7,096; the ad valorem equivalence is 91 per cent; the higher grade of goods being taxed 17 per cent less than the cheaper grade.

Flannels weighing only 4 ounces a square yard, valued not above 70 cents per pound, carry a duty of 44 cents per pound plus 50 per cent. Importations, 1911, amounted to $2,030; revenues collected amounted to $2,475; the ad valorem equivalence is 121.93 per cent. Valued at over 70 cents per pound the duty is 44 cents per pound plus 55 per cent. Importations amounted to, 1911, $75,501; revenue derived was $80,843; the ad valorem equivalence is 107 per cent. The cheaper class of goods are taxed about 15 per cent more than the more costly. All these duties are substantially prohibitive.

Wool dress goods for women and children, with cotton warp valued at not more than 70 cents per pound, are taxed at 7 cents per square yard plus 50 per cent; ad valorem equivalence, 103.39 per cent. Wool dress goods valued at more than 15 cents a yard and above 70 cents a pound; ad valorem equivalence is 94.28 per cent. These goods, weighing over 4 ounces per square yard, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, bear a duty of 33 cents per pound plus 50 per cent less 5 per cent; importations, 1911, $346; duty collected, $452; ad valorem equivalence, 130.68 per cent. Same goods valued at over 70 cents per pound bear a duty of 44 cents per pound plus 55 per cent less 5 per cent; importations, $228,932; revenue collected, $224,971; ad valorem equivalence, 98.27 per cent. The better class goods are taxed 32 per cent less than the coarser goods.

Dress goods composed wholly or in part of wool, weighing over 4 ounces per square yard, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, bear a duty of 33 cents per pound plus 50 per cent; imports, 1911, amounted to $57; duties collected, $89.88; ad valorem equivalence, 157 per cent. Same goods valued at over 70 cents per pound have a duty of 44 cents per pound plus 55 per cent. The ad valorem equivalence of duties collected, 102 per cent, being 55 per cent less than on the coarser goods.

There are 11 grades of carpets enumerated in this schedule. The lowest equivalent ad valorem duty on importations in 1911 was 50 per cent and the highest 72 per cent.

All of the above-enumerated woolens, which constitute the clothing of the people, are taxed at an ad valorem equivalence of over 100 per cent; and those articles of the cheaper sorts are taxed largely more than those more costly goods used by the richer people.

The duties on the coarser goods are prohibitive, and there are no importations.

On knit fabrics—not wearing apparel—valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the ad valorem duty is 153 per cent; valued above 70 cents a pound the duty is 95 per cent, a difference of 58 per cent. All other manufactures of wool, valued at more than 40 cents a pound, 157 per cent; valued at more than 70 cents a pound, 84.66 per cent, a difference of 72 per cent.

In the woolen schedule there are 27 separate articles upon which the duties imposed exceed 100 per cent.

Mr. President, as I have said, an examination of this schedule will show that the duties on 27 items in it are over 100 per cent.

I said awhile ago, and I repeat it, the woolen industry, protected for 40 years by duties averaging something like 90 per cent, one of the most prosperous industries, if not the most prosperous industry in this country, operating as a trust in violation of the law, arbitrarily fixing the price of its product by reason of high protective duties, under the shelter of protection and monopoly, is paying the lowest wages to its employees of any industry in this country except only one. That would seem a startling statement, and yet I will show that the wages paid in this industry, certainly in one section of the country, where imported foreign pauper labor has displaced American labor, are not upon the average as high as is paid in the cornfields and the wheat fields of the Middle West, and when we consider the fact that his house is furnished to him free, that his garden and potato patch are furnished to him free, not much higher, if any higher, than the negro's wages in the cotton fields of the South.

The average weekly wage in the woolen and worsted goods industry is only $9.96.

This industry, paying the lowest wages of any industry except one in this country, employing to the displacement of American labor the pauper labor of the backward countries of Europe, whenever a suggestion of the reduction of tariff rates is made, comes to Congress and demands, in the name of protection for American labor, a continuance of these excessive and monopolistic rates, and threatens, if they are not continued, to close down their factories or reduce the wages of their aggregation of Huns and Magyars, Poles and Italians.

I have here some extracts from the report of the United States Commissioner of Labor of his investigation of the recent strike at Lawrence, Mass., a center of textile manufacturing in New England, and the conditions in Lawrence are typical of this industry in the North and East.

As to wages, the report says—this is a quotation from a Government report—

The average amount received by the 21,922 employees—

That is, in the Lawrence mills—during a week late in 1909, in which the mills were running full time, was $8.76. Almost one-third of the total number received less than $7 during the week, and approximately one-half as many received $12 and over during the week.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator the figures showing how many children work in those mills?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I have not.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that a large percentage of the 21,922 employees referred to by the Senator are boys and girls, and that the average per week is ascertained by including the wages paid to children.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask in what factories these children are employed?

Mr. SMOOT. In all the woolen factories of the country.

Mr. STONE. Of what age are these children?

Mr. SMOOT. The various States have different laws on the subject. In some States the lowest age at which children can be employed, I think, is 10; in others it runs up to 12, and in some even as high as 14. They work, Mr. President, in the spinning room, in the carding room; they carry bobbins, and do all the work that a child can do just as well as a man can do.

Mr. STONE. Being from Missouri, I would like to be shown something more about that.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had ever been in a woolen mill he would not have to be shown. He would have seen for himself. I will say further that of the employees referred to in the article I suppose nearly one-third are women.

Mr. SIMMONS. Some of them are women.

Mr. SMOOT. A woman makes just as good a weaver as a man does.

Mr. SIMMONS. Some are women, but the average wage paid males, those over 18 years, is very small. I said a little while ago, and I repeat it, that this industry pays the lowest wages to both men and women of any industry in the country except one. I have a table here giving the average amount of weekly earnings, not of females and children, but of men over 18 years of age, in the different industries of the country. It is found on page 147 of the book recently published by Jeremiah W. Jenks and W. Jett Lauck, members of the Immigration Commission, on The Immigration Problem.

Mr. President, the House has sent us a bill reducing the duties on wool and woolens about 35 per cent. That bill was referred to the Finance Committee, and a Republican majority of that committee has reported it adversely. Representing the Democratic members of that committee, I ask that the action of that committee be overruled and the bill be passed. I want to say to the administration Republicans on the other side of the Chamber, in view of the promises of the Republican Party with reference to tariff revision, in view of the declaration of the President with reference to the indefensible duties of Schedule K, in view of the fact that the Tariff Board has made a report on wool and woolens, if they will not agree to this bill, it is incumbent on them to offer a substitute for it. All the conditions upon which their platform and their President promised relief have been performed, and I submit they can not escape the obligation to support what we offer or present a measure of their own.

Mr. President, I wish I had time, and that the patience of the Senate would permit, to analyze the Tariff Board report on wool and woolens, in order to show how utterly unreliable it is as a basis of legislation with reference to the tariff, but I have not. It is not necessary in support of this bill that I should go into this matter because this bill is not framed with any reference to the Republican theory of protection or with any reference to the Republican platform declaration of the measure of protection that the industries of the country are entitled to. It is framed upon the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue. But if it were necessary to show that the Tariff Board's report on these products is utterly unreliable as a basis of tariff legislation, even if we were legislating upon the theory of the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, now advocated by the Republican Party, it would be an easy thing to do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina whether the facts found by the Tariff Board lead to a reduction in the tariff or point out any specific reduction that can be made?

Mr. SIMMONS. My own judgment, from an examination, and rather a careful examination, of it is that the recommendations of that board, if followed, would result in a reduction of the tariff nearly as great as is provided in the bill I am discussing.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So if the Republican Party should frame a measure based upon the report of the Tariff Board it would mean a reduction.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and a very large reduction.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of from approximately 30 to 35 per cent?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; something near that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And I presume if the Democrats are unable to pass the bill which has come from the House they would cooperate——

Mr. SIMMONS. Who would cooperate?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Democrats would cooperate with the Republicans of this body in passing such a bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just said—the Senator may not have been here when I said it—that if the Republicans are not willing, in view of the present situation with reference to Schedule K, in view of the demand of the people for relief from its exactions, to accept the bill we have offered them, they at least owe it to the people, in view of their pledges, in view of the declarations and recommendations of their President, in view of the findings of the Tariff Board, to offer us a bill reducing duties according to their idea and their interpretation of the recommendations of the Tariff Board; and if they are not willing to present to this Congress and give it an opportunity to pass a bill that carries out the report of that commission as they see it, then the Republican Party ought to cease to hold that report up as an obstacle and impediment to tariff legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am glad the Senator from North Carolina has accentuated that view so emphatically.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not said that we would vote for what they offered. but I say they owe it to themselves, to the President, and to the people to whom they made these promises, if they will not accept our bill, to offer some bill here which they claim carries out the Tariff Board report, or they should cease to hold up that report as an obstacle and impediment to tariff legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether it can not be safely stated that the Democrats, if they are unable to pass a bill of their own framing, will join in passing any bill that insures a substantial reduction in these excessive duties?

Mr. SIMMONS. If we can not get as much as we want we will take less, but it must be a reduction that will afford substantial relief to the people from the burdens that now weigh so heavily upon them.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want the Senator to state in this connection what percentage of reduction in the wool schedule would be authorized if you followed the report of the so-called Tariff Board?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not able to state specifically what it would be, but I think, as I said a while ago, it would be over 30 per cent. I am sure it would be on raw wool, and I think it would be somewhat over that rate on manufactured wool.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, it has always struck me as one of the contradictions of our legislative life that where the three parties who have to share in legislation—the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the President of the United States—all agree that a reduction should be made in the tariff we can not by some method before we adjourn make that reduction. It seems to me it is a confession of legislative and executive incapacity if we fail to meet in some degree the demands of the people when all agree that a reduction should be made. I hope that an earnest effort will be made in this direction before we adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very anxious to get through and give opportunity to some other gentlemen who want to speak on the subject to do so. That is the only reason I prefer not to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not quite catch the reply of the Senator from North Carolina to the Senator from Nevada. Did I understand the Senator from North Carolina to say that there was an arrangement with Senators on this side of the Chamber for a reduction of the duties on wool?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Michigan understood the Senator from North Carolina to say nothing of the kind. The Senator from Nevada asked me if we could not pass our bill and had an opportunity to pass a bill which would give some substantial relief to the people, whether we would accept it or not, and I said, following our policy with reference to that in recent Congresses, we would probably do that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from North Carolina and the leader of his party in this tariff discussion adheres to the bill which he originally presented from his committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, the bill from the House, although the committee made an unfavorable report upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator adheres to the House bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do; and so does this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And there is no arrangement, as I understand it, with any Senators on this side of the Chamber for any other course than a direct vote on that question?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. I will say to the Senator from Michigan, as I stated to the Senator from Nevada, if we can not get our bill and if we can get a bill that will afford substantial, practical relief to the people from these exactions—I care not whence it comes—following our past policy and record upon that matter, we would take it in preference to nothing. But it would have to be something carrying substantial relief and not a mere pretense of relief.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator maintain that the duty should be taken off of raw wool altogether?

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill I am advocating does not provide that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator believe it ought to be taken off? Is this the first attempt, and are we soon to have the second attempt, which will take the duty off altogether and leave the wool industry in this country with no protection against Australia and other wool-producing sections?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator wants my opinion upon that subject, I will give it to him. I think the House acted wisely——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. In retaining a 20 per cent duty upon wool, because I believe that will prove a good revenue-producing rate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that as a matter of expediency, or did the House and does the Senator from North Carolina favor free wool?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not favor free wool.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator favors free wool and the restoration of the times we had when the last Wilson bill was in effect, I should like to have the country know it. If we are again to be guided by another Prof. Wilson into such a situation as that, I think the country ought to know it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Republican Party has repeated that old story about the Wilson bill now for 15 years, and under that pretense they have enacted laws that have enabled its beneficiaries yearly to filch from the people of this country millions of their earnings for the benefit of the stockholders of these special industries.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from North Carolina in all seriousness defend the Wilson bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. As a whole, yes; I did not favor everything in it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did the Senator from North Carolina vote for the Wilson law?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I was not in Congress at the time of the passage of the Wilson bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did he approve it on the stump among his people?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did, as a whole. But the approval of a general law, especially one containing several thousand items, does not require the approval of every item in the law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from North Carolina approve it to-day?

Mr. SIMMONS. As a whole, I approve it, although there are features in it I do not approve, and on account of changes in controlling conditions there were provisions in it which might have been wise then, which would not be proper under the new conditions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Democratic Party, under the leadership of the Senator from North Carolina, undertake to put such a law upon the statute books again?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Democratic Party, if restored to power, will revise the tariff laws according to present conditions, doing justice to the people—consumer as well as producer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will it be for free trade in wool?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Michigan knows that the Democratic Party, speaking through the House of Representatives in this very bill, does not now favor free wool—the House bill we are now discussing imposes a revenue duty of 20 per cent on raw wool.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am informed 80 Members of the House of Representatives, in Democratic caucus, favored free wool; and the Senator from North Carolina knows it.

This is only one step in the direction of the Wilson law of years ago, which destroyed the flocks of the American farmer and ruined the woolen industry of our country, and finally drove the Democratic Party into a merited retirement, from which they have had no disposition until to-day to come again on such a principle.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator is repeating the same old story the Republican Party has been trying to palm off on the credulous for 15 or 16 years. There was never anything in it, as the intelligent and informed have known. The Wilson bill did not bring the panic. The panic started under the McKinley bill; it was world-wide, and it began to recede under the Wilson Act, and had almost disappeared before it was repealed and superseded by the Dingley law, which every hour and every day during the 12 years of its existence filched the pockets of the toiling millions of their hard earnings, to the enrichment of the legion of monopolies and trusts which its bounties created and nurtured.

Under the conditions created by this Republican tariff measure and the Payne-Aldrich bill, which is but a reaffirmation of it, the necessaries of life were monopolized, the struggle for living made harder, the poor poorer, the rich richer, eventuating in a crystallization of public sentiment among the victims of these tariff exactions that there will be no relief from these evils until the Republican Party is driven from power.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to trespass too much upon the time of the Senator from North Carolina, but I have a pride in the Dingley bill. I was a Member of the House of Representatives when it was passed, and, as I recollect it, the party to which the Senator from North Carolina belongs did not for more than a decade even dare voice any public protest against its enactment.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Dingley bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Dingley bill, replacing a bill that had brought this country to ruin.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator seriously mean to tell the Senate and the country that the Democratic Party did not oppose the adoption of the Dingley bill and has not denounced it every day of its existence?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I say their protest was so feeble that it was scarcely understood in this country, because we thought the Dingley bill would replace a tariff bill which was odious and which had driven men from their employment throughout the country, until the soup public house was one of the most common sights in the cities. The Senator from North Carolina knows that the Wilson law wrought havoc and ruin to the industries of our country and scattered our labor where it could not find employment. I was one of the men who helped to replace it with the Dingley law, that brought prosperity to the country and reemployment to labor and gave the necessary increase in revenues to meet the expenses of the Government.

Mr. President, I am amazed at the Senator from North Carolina, coming from a State where industries thrive and teem with prosperity, due almost entirely to the principle of protection, which he is to-day opposing—I am amazed at the Senator from North Carolina that he is willing to again draw out from its retirement a bill that brought such ruin to the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yielded to the Senator for a question and he is injecting a speech into my speech.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I beg the Senator's pardon for it. The Senator invited it.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think he did in the latter part.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is always forceful and entertaining, but my time, as I explained when interrupted by the Senator from Idaho, and as the Senator knows, is limited. I did not mean to cut the Senator off, but only to remind him of the time limitations under which we have to speak to-day so as to allow all who are scheduled to speak some time before the hour to vote arrives.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire and I will not now be diverted into a general discussion of the relative merits of the Wilson, the Dingley, and the Payne-Aldrich bills. It would not be pertinent to the matter in hand and I have not the time without doing injustice to others who wish to speak, but I will say in further reply to the Senator from Michigan that, while I do not approve of all that was written in the Wilson Act, as I presume he does not approve of everything written in the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich Acts, in the main and as a whole I did approve that law, though changed conditions would now require changes in rates of duties that were proper from the Democratic standpoint in the conditions existing at the time of its enactment. Of course those from whom its provisions in the interest of the people took the opportunity they had enjoyed under the McKinley Act to exploit the people through unreasonable and unfair profits disapproved it, but it was satisfactory to the people. Instead of bringing ruin on the country it was gradually lifting the country out of the conditions into which it was well advanced long before it was enacted, and if it had not been repealed our return to normal condition would have probably been faster than it was.

But while the protected interests whose bounties it curtailed were the chief and almost only complainants against it, the dissatisfaction with the Dingley law, culminating in the promise of the Republican Party in 1908 to immediately revise it in response to a compelling demand from the people, came not from the few it had licensed to prey upon the many, but from the millions whom it had placed at their mercy and who could not live and have their being without paying them daily tribute. The complaint against it was from the people, not the interests.

I fain would refrain from any comments upon the Payne-Aldrich bill which supplanted it. Nobody defends it. There never has been in this or any country a tariff enactment so generally reprobated and denounced and which so richly deserves the censure heaped upon it.

So general, Mr. President, is this condemnation, so well satisfied are the people that this measure is responsible for the trusts and the monopolies that are plundering them, so well satisfied are the people that it is the source and inspiration of the unreasonable advance in the cost of the necessaries of life that is oppressing them, that their condemnation against it is not confined to the bill itself, but their displeasure has assumed the form of political excommunication against almost every man whose name was prominently identified with its passage through the House or Senate.

If the opportunities for exploitation, if the excessive profits of a few were curtailed by the Wilson Act, there was compensation in the fact that the people were to that extent in many cases relieved of unjust exactions. On the other hand, the Payne-Aldrich law circumscribed the opportunities of the many and denied a fair return to toil and energy and enterprise by unreasonably increasing the fixed charges which every man and every industry must meet. The burden which the Dingley and the Payne-Aldrich laws have imposed upon the productive energies of the people during the 15 years of their operation is incalculable and can not be measured in dollars and cents.

Mr. President, I regret I have not the time to enter into an analysis of the Tariff Board report as I had intended, but it would be unjust for me to consume the time necessary to do so when other Senators desire to speak, especially the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who has introduced a substitute for the pending bill and is entitled to an opportunity to explain and discuss its provisions.

I will not undertake that analysis, but I ask that I may have printed as an appendix to my remarks certain tables which I hold in my hand, prepared for me by the expert assigned to assist the minority members of the Finance Committee, analyzing the Tariff Board's report and showing the utter unreliability of the findings of the report as to the cost of producing wool in this country.

This analysis will show that in some sections of the country wool is produced for practically no cost at all; that in other sections it is produced not only without cost but with a bonus, the income from mutton and lamb more than paying the total cost, while in other sections the cost of producing a pound of wool ranges from 12 to 19 cents.

It will further show that in the flocks selected in each table the cost of producing wool in the same section from one flock was wholly at variance with the cost of producing wool from another flock of the same kind and breed of sheep, and that the attempt of the board to ascertain with any reasonable degree of accuracy the cost of producing wool in this or foreign countries by the method of calculation adopted by it was vain and futile if not impossible. I ask permission to print this document, which I have marked "Appendix A," as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SANDERS in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish also to present to the Senate a most illuminating study published in the Textile World-Record, of Boston, by Mr. Samuel S. Dale, a great authority upon this subject, and who, I understand, assisted the Tariff Board in their work, giving a thorough analysis of that report and showing most conclusively its utter unreliability as a basis of legislation upon the tariff. I would like and had intended to discuss some of the suggestions of Mr. Dale, but I can not do so without trenching too greatly upon the time of others who have a right to be heard, and I shall therefore have to content myself with asking permission to print parts of it as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Reprinted from the Textile World-Record, Boston, June, 1912.]

ANALYSIS OF THE TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON SCHEDULE K.

(By Samuel S. Dale.)

The report of the Tariff Board on the wool and wool goods schedule should be judged first by the extent to which the board has succeeded in attaining the professed object of its investigation, namely, the determination of the difference between the foreign and domestic cost of producing the raw materials and the partly and wholly manufactured products of wool manufacturing.

THE DIFFERENCE IN COST FORMULA.

This object has been definitely and repeatedly stated during the last four years, and recently by the President in these words:

"First, by fixing the rates at figures * * * based on the difference between the cost of production here and the cost of production abroad, ascertained by means which preclude all doubt of the substantial accuracy of the calculation."

In order to show to what extent this object has been attained by the Tariff Board I have made the following list of the principal products affected by Schedule K, and annexed a brief statement of the information disclosed by the Tariff Board regarding the difference in the domestic and foreign cost of each: Raw wool, wool by-products, shoddy, worsted tops, roving, yarn, cloths and dress goods, carpets and rugs, underwear, hosiery, felts, and narrow fabrics.

RAW WOOL.

The method adopted by the board for calculating the cost of wool is stated on page 313 as follows:

"We have considered wool as the chief product, and the receipts from mutton are offset against costs. When the receipts from mutton are less than the total flock expense, the difference is called the 'net charge against wool.' When, on the other hand, the receipts from mutton are greater than the expense, the difference is the 'net credit to wool.' And this net charge against or net credit to wool, divided by the number of pounds of wool, is the 'net charge against or net credit to a pound of wool.'"

On the preceding page—312—the board condemns this method in these words:

"Another method is to consider wool the chief product and mutton the by-product and to charge the total operating costs to the mutton and credit the net income of the business to the wool. * * * When, however, the receipts from mutton equal the operating costs, the cost of producing a pound of wool, as found by this method, is nothing; and when the receipts from mutton exceed the operating costs it is less than nothing. * * * It is evident that this method also is inadmissible because the cost of producing a pound of wool, thus determined, varies with the relative importance of the receipts from wool and mutton. When wool is the chief source of income and the receipts from mutton are merely incidental and relatively small, this method is approximately correct; but as the receipts from mutton become relatively more important, the degree of error increases, and when mutton is the chief source of income and the receipts from wool are merely incidental, the futility of the method is clearly apparent."

This condemnation of its own method was superfluous. The absurdity of a calculation by which the cost of wool is a positive quantity under some conditions, zero under others, and under others the wool is obtained without cost, bringing a bonus with it, is self-evident. The report contains extensive tables of cost of American wool based on this misleading method of inquiry.

For the foreign branch of the wool inquiry this method of calculation, of course, could not be carried out in such great detail, but the results are given for Australian wool on page 11 as follows:

"In New Zealand and on the favorably situated runs of Australia it seems clear that at the present range of values for stock sheep and mutton the receipts from other sources than wool are carrying the total flock expense. So that, taking Australasia as a whole, it appears that a charge of a very few cents per pound lies against the great clips of that region in the aggregate."

The report itself supplies the proof that the board has failed completely to determine the difference between the foreign and domestic cost of wool. The board admits this in these words, on page 10:

"It is not possible to state in exact terms the actual cost of producing a pound of wool, considered by itself."

WOOL BY-PRODUCTS.

These products include noils and the various wastes that are unavoidably made in converting wool and by-products into finished goods. They are inferior grades of raw material. In calculating the cost of wool goods the value of the by-products is deducted from the cost of the raw material used in order to determine the net cost of the latter. No part of the cost of manufacturing is charged to the production of by-products. For this reason the Tariff Board is right in the following conclusion, page 12:

"No comparison as to the cost of production of such products can be made."

SHODDY.

Wool rags may be properly classed as a wool by-product, and the omission of any reference to their cost is explained on that ground, but shoddy is a manufactured product for which rags are the raw material. The report contains no statement on the cost of manufacturing shoddy.

WORSTED TOPS.

In taking up the various wool products in their order of manufacture, worsted tops are the first for which the Tariff Board offers a detailed comparison of cost. A number of important features of the board's investigations of comparative costs will therefore be considered under this head, but it should be borne in mind that the remarks apply not only to tops, but to wool manufactures generally.

The report gives a comparative statement of the domestic and foreign cost of converting wool into tops, but makes no attempt to give the cost of raw material. It is evident, however, that the difference in the total cost of a wool product must be known in order to apply the difference in cost principle in fixing tariff rates. The omission of any important item of cost makes the comparison worthless for that particular purpose. In the case of worsted tops the board has omitted the item of raw material. The variations in the cost of raw material, not only for tops, but for other forms of wool manufactures, are so great from grade to grade and from time to time that its determination is impossible. This impossibility in the case of wool fabrics was recognized and frankly stated by the board, page 628, in these words:

"The question of raw material was eliminated altogether, since this is such a fluctuating element."

That is true of worsted tops as well as cloths. Turning to the board's investigation of the conversion cost of tops, attention is called to the fluctuating and uncertain elements involved as outlined on pages 640 and 641 of the report. Admitting these fluctuations and uncertainties does not eliminate them, and they alone would thwart the purpose of the inquiry. But on top of all these factors the board informs us, page 641, that the mill records disclose "the widest divergencies" in the conversion cost of worsted tops:

"In attempting to arrive at the cost of tops from a consideration of actual mill records for a given period of time, we have found the widest divergencies, due to the difference in output. For a six months' period in one mill the average cost of production for all tops was only 4.28 cents per pound, while for another six months' period in the same mill, running upon practically the same quality of tops, the actual average was 9.37 cents per pound. In the first period, however, the output was about three and one-half times the output in the second period. In the first case the mill was running overtime and in the second case much of the machinery was idle, while the fixed and overhead charges continued the same."

The Tariff Board attempts to meet this situation by assuming a theoretical production on the basis of a full running time. This, however, is assuming a condition that is never found to prevail throughout the industry, or continuously in any combing plant.

If so much emphasis had not been placed on the difference in cost theory we might profitably stop here and accept the evidence disclosed by worsted tops as conclusive that the theory can not be applied to the revision of Schedule K. As far as tops are concerned we find that an item constituting approximately 90 per cent of the total cost has been omitted entirely, because it could not be determined, while the items making up the remaining 10 per cent are subject to "the widest divergencies." The conclusion is unavoidable that the board has not determined and can not determine the difference between the domestic and foreign cost of tops.

ROVING.

No attempt is made to give the costs of roving separately. This cost is made up of raw material and the various processes up to and including worsted drawing. Raw material, as we have seen, is eliminated entirely from the board's calculations. The final process, drawing, is considered on pages 1031 to 1034, but, as in the case of woolen yarn, the figures relate to the labor cost only, all the other items of expense being omitted. We have noted the defects in the calculations for tops, the cost of which is included in the cost of roving, so that it is now necessary only to record the unavoidable conclusion that the difference in cost has not been determined for roving.

YARN.

The noteworthy feature of the board's report on yarn costs is the omission of essential details relating to the cost of carded woolen yarn. On pages 1025 and 1026 there are the reports of the labor cost of woolen carding in 26 mills. On pages 1040 and 1041 are reports of the labor cost of woolen spinning in a like number of establishments. Nowhere is there a statement of the cost of the other items, such as raw material and manufacturing expense, which make up much the greater part of the cost of woolen yarn. The report deals in greater detail with the cost of worsted yarn. On page 645 there begins a general survey of the question. On page 646 are statements of cost for four separate weeks in one mill. It is rather puzzling to find the output given as "yarn shipped," but accepting the figures as indicating the yarn spun, we find the conversion cost varying from 9½ cents on August 26 to 26½ cents a pound on August 5, with the yarn size practically the same. No better proof of the impossibility of determining cost for the purpose of applying the difference in cost formula to the revision of tariffs is required. The board attempts to avoid this difficulty, as in the case of tops, by assuming a full output. Thus on page 646:

"In view of this difficulty the Tariff Board has adopted a general rule of figuring all costs on the basis of full normal output, as in the case of tops."

This is assuming a condition that never prevails for any considerable time throughout the industry. Moreover, the question arises, How did the board revise the cost returns received so as to determine the result that would have been actually reached if the mill had been doing something that it was not doing?

On page 650 the report says:

"Figures of cost were secured in England from various manufacturers on actual samples, and in the second column in the table below are given the figures which represent the average of these various calculations."

From this it is evident that the board obtained from "various manufacturers" in England estimates of cost of certain grades of worsted yarn. These estimates were averaged by some unexplained process and the results tabulated on page 610 for the purpose of comparison with the figures obtained from American mills and revised by the board at Washington. That is the result, or rather lack of result, attained by the board in investigating the cost of the material, white worsted yarn, which of all the multitudinous products of wool manufacturing offered the least difficulty in such an inquiry.

CLOTHS AND DRESS GOODS.

The cost of cloths and dress goods includes the cost of the yarn and the conversion cost of the yarn into the finished product. To include in the cost calculation for cloth the operations which the board adopted for the preceding processes would concentrate in this calculation all the uncertainties and errors which have been referred to under the head of raw wool, wool by-products, shoddy, worsted tops, roving, and yarn. Moreover, such a method was impossible because of the omission of essential items, as in the case of by-products and shoddy. The Tariff Board evidently recognized this dilemma, for a new start was made, with yarn treated as a raw material and the cost calculations for the preceding processes eliminated entirely. The report thus explains how this result was accomplished (p. 628):

"An arbitrary price was assumed for different qualities of wool and yarn, this arbitrary price being the actual price so far as it could be accurately determined for a given date."

This method has the merit of boldness and simplicity, although it can not be claimed that it "precludes all doubts of the substantial accuracy of the calculation." The figures thus adopted by the fiat of the board as a substitute for the cost of raw material and its conversion into yarn are termed "prices for a given date." This does not change the fact that they are not costs as contemplated in the formula. It makes the matter worse, for it shows that the board's ideas were so unstable as to shift from production cost to price without hesitation. This confusion of ideas regarding cost and price is so complete that one of the estimates, No. 32, page 672, contains this:

"This gives a total cost of 86 cents per yard for those making their own yarn and 95.5 cents per yard where yarn is purchased."

The adoption of the fiat figures of cost for wool and yarn would alone make the results of this part of the inquiry worthless, regardless of the accuracy of the subsequent calculations, and for that reason it is perhaps unnecessary to say more on this particular point. Attention is called, however, to the fact that the list of the figures thus adopted by fiat for wool and yarn is omitted from the report. It is to be found on Tariff Board schedules 1128 and 1129. The following grades and prices are given in the list to cover carded woolen yarn made of wool and mixtures of wool, cotton, shoddy, and by-products:

12 to 16 cut, one-fourth blood worsted waste and shoddy	$0.55
12 to 20 cut, one-fourth blood and shoddy (colors)	.65
12 to 20 cut, one-fourth blood and noils (white)	.70
12 to 20 cut, one-fourth blood and noils (colors)	.75
12 to 20 cut, straight one-fourth blood (white)	.80
20 to 28 cut, straight three-eighths blood (white)	.85
From 20 to 28 cut add 1 cent per cut.
32 cut, fine white carbonized	.95
40 cut, fine white carbonized	1.10
2–12 to 2–18 cut, one-fourth blood worsted waste and shoddy	.50
2–18 to 2–20 cut, in grease	.62½
2–18 to 2–20 cut, in colors	.70
2–22 to 2–24 cut, skein dyed in colors	.77½

There are no established standards for such yarns. They are spun from new wool of every grade; also from mixtures containing wool, cotton, shoddy, and by-products in every imaginable proportion, some with the wool, cotton, shoddy, or by-products omitted and the mixture made up of the whole or a part of the remaining materials. Not only the proportion, but also the cost per pound of each of these materials varies widely from grade to grade and from time to time. As a result the average cost of the mixtures is subject to even greater fluctuations.

Fixed prices or cost figures are equally absurd in the case of worsted yarn and wool. No feature of the Tariff Board's investigation excites greater astonishment than does this substitution of arbitrary prices for actual cost. This extraordinary method has evidently been adopted not only for American costs, but for foreign costs as well. Take, for example, sample No. 26, page 667. This cloth is made of two grades of cotton yarn and one of worsted. The report says, page 667:

"The average cost of the yarn used was $0.692 per pound; the resulting cost of the stock material in a yard of cloth is $0.55."

The English cost of the yarn is thus stated, page 668:

"The yarn material for a yard of cloth is taken at a cost of $0.4085."

These figures do not represent cost in any mill either in this country or abroad. They result from some undisclosed system of estimating, based on arbitrary prices for foreign and domestic yarn. Such calculations do not come up to the level of ordinary guesswork.

As was the case when studying the board's cost figures for worsted tops, the temptation again becomes strong to leave this feature of the report with the conclusion that the case against the difference in cost formula has been proved, but so much emphasis has been placed on this formula that we will go on to the end of the list.

CONVERSION COST.

Turning to the inquiry into the cost of converting yarn into cloth, the fact claiming attention first is that the board's figures do not relate to the actual cost of the cloths, but to estimates of their cost. This is admitted on page 628 where the report, after stating the impossibility of determining the actual cost, says:

"The only method available was to start with certain specific cloths and get the most accurate estimates possible from a number of different mills on the cost of making goods of this quality."

The inherent difference between actual cost, as contemplated in the formula and an estimate of cost is evident. A manufacturer may estimate the cost of a fabric regardless of whether the goods were made in his mill or not. He determines the character of the raw material by the exercise of judgment, and the construction of the fabric by analysis, and with these particulars makes an estimate of cost based on assumed conditions of market price of materials and expense in the mill. This, however, is not the actual cost, which is determined only by the actual manufacturer of the goods, and it is the actual cost which is meant in the difference in cost formula. Not only has the board substituted estimated cost for real cost, but these estimates have been obtained under conditions that make irregularities and errors inevitable.

The report states, page 629, that the agents of the board "visited the mills with samples and worked out with the proper officials the cost under each separate process." The published results of their labors are found on pages 651 to 690, in the form of estimates of cost of 55 samples of American wool goods, and on pages 694 to 704 in the form of estimates of the cost of 14 samples of foreign fabrics.

Fortunately it is not necessary to rely solely on one's own judgment or on the opinion of others as to the merits of this system of cost estimates. Three years ago, in 1909, the American Association of Woolen and Worsted Manufacturers adopted the same plan and submitted to a large number of manufacturers the specifications for three worsted and two carded woolen fabrics with a request that estimates of the cost of these goods be returned to the association. As was done by the Tariff Board, uniform prices were assumed by the association for the wool and yarn. Following is a statement of the lowest, highest, and average estimates:

	Lowest.	Highest.	Average.
Fabric A	$1.50	$2.02	$1.75⅝
Fabric B	1.47½	1.98	1.78
Fabric C	1.06	1.53	1.29
Fabric D	1.10	1.65	1.37
Fabric E	.85	1.02½	.93¾

Such figures are worthless, and it is certain that the estimates of the Tariff Board are no better.

The sole difference between the estimates of the association and those of the Tariff Board is that the agents of the board worked out the figures with the mill officials in accordance with a definite system prescribed by the board. But a cost system can not be applied successfully in a mill on short notice. It is necessary, first, to apply a system for a long period, a year or more, in order to determine the cost per unit of production in the various departments of a mill. Not before this is done does it become possible to make a fairly close estimate of the cost of a given fabric when made in that mill under like conditions. An attempt, such as was made by the Tariff Board, to apply suddenly to a large number of unprepared mills a new system of cost estimating is calculated to give results as misleading and erroneous as were those obtained three years ago by the American Association of Woolen and Worsted Manufacturers. This is evident from the details of the board's estimates. For example, the conversion cost of sample No. 1 is given as 8 cents per yard, and this note of explanation is annexed, page 652:

"Taking all of the cost secured by the board from mills of all sizes the average conversion cost is 11.1 cents per yard."

This means that some of the estimates must have varied from 8 cents to considerably over 11 cents a yard. No two mills would agree as to the estimated cost, yet the board adopts one set of figures for each sample. Why was 8 cents selected for the figures given in the report, when the average was 11.1 cents? And was this average calculated by a method that gave the mills an equal weight regardless of size? These questions may appear superfluous in view of the fundamental defects already noted in the calculations, but reference is made to them in order to make the analysis as complete as possible. For the same reason a review will be made of various other features of the estimates.

A number of the estimates refer to fabrics made of wool yarn mixed with cotton or silk yarn. An application of the difference in cost formula would make it necessary to determine the cost of the cotton and silk yarn as well as the wool. Nowhere is such cost given. Apparently arbitrary figures have been assumed for the cost of the silk and cotton yarn, as well as for the wool yarn, and an average of the three calculated by some unexplained process. For example, sample No. 24, page 666, is made of a mixture of cotton, silk, and worsted yarn, and the "cost" of the three is given as follows:

"The average cost of the yarn described is $0.714 per pound, making a total stock cost of $0.571 per yard of finished cloth."

The plan pursued in the board's estimates of the foreign cost of the various samples is thus explained on page 630:

"The method adopted in securing foreign costs on American samples was similar to that used in this country. Samples of identical fabrics cut from the same piece were taken to England and to the Continent. These were shown to a number of manufacturers and their estimates on the cost of production secured, but not in the same detail as in American mills, because foreign manufacturers do not keep their costs in any such detail. In England the costings on these samples are given with the authority of a cloth expert, himself a manufacturer, who took the English estimates secured and corrected or verified them from his own experience or from the costs in his own mill."

The woolen and worsted industry in England is organized on a different basis from that generally prevailing in this country. Cost calculations are simpler and probably more accurate in that country than they are here. For these reasons a fair comparison of the costs in the two countries is possible only after careful revision. Such a complicated cost estimate schedule as the one prepared by the Tariff Board would stagger English manufacturers. The above extract from the report makes it plain that they did not understand the board's system and did not attempt to carry it out. Figures, however, are easily obtained and the agents of the board obtained them from a few English manufacturers. Evidently these figures bore the marks of unreliability, for they were referred to a "cloth expert, himself a manufacturer," who "corrected or verified them from his own experience or the costs in his own (English) mill." It is unnecessary for us to follow this system into France and Germany. Adopted in response to an order to determine the difference in the cost of production "by means which preclude all doubt as to the substantial accuracy of the calculation," it abandons the cost of production entirely and substitutes estimates based on assumed figures for the greater part of the cost, and for the remainder on methods that are unworthy of serious consideration either at home or abroad. The Tariff Board knew of the defects in estimates of cost, as the following passage, page 628, shows:

"The difficulty here lay in the well-known fact that estimates on the same sample by different manufacturers may vary very widely, and experience in this regard by associations in the trade who have attempted to arrive at some standard cost method showed the necessity for adopting every precaution to make these figures as detailed, accurate, and fair as possible."

But stating a difficulty does not overcome it, and the knowledge on the part of the board that estimates would not disclose what they were seeking only increases the surprise that such a plan was adopted. No precautions can make estimates conform to actual cost. In the absence of a knowledge of the actual cost there is no way of verifying or correcting the estimates.

CARPETS, RUGS, UNDERWEAR.

The report gives no information regarding the cost of these goods, this explanation for the omission being found on page 9:

"It proved impracticable to carry out at one and the same time an indefinite number of separate cost inquiries and bring them all to conclusion at a given date. For this reason we are not able to include in the present report data as to the cost of underwear and carpets, regarding which our investigations are not sufficiently advanced to make the results practically useful."

HOSIERY, FELTS, NARROW FABRICS.

On the cost of these products the Tariff Board makes no report deserving consideration.

We have reached the end of the list of products. Summing up the situation, we find that the Tariff Board's inquiry into cost of production has nowhere given results in whose accuracy any confidence can be placed. Some wool products were omitted entirely—carpets, knit goods, felts, and narrow fabrics for lack of time; by-products, because the task was impossible.

A fundamentally unsound method was adopted for raw wool. Where costs were actually investigated, as in the case of worsted tops and yarn, the fluctuations from time to time and from mill to mill made self-evident the impossibility of determining the costs for the purpose of fixing tariff rates. For some materials—roving and yarn, for example—the manufacturing expenses other than labor were omitted. Likewise in some cases raw material, subject as it is to constant, extreme, and indeterminate variations in cost, was eliminated bodily from the calculations. In other cases arbitrary figures were assumed to indicate the fluctuating and uncertain cost of raw material. Estimates were substituted for statements of actual cost. Calculations that could be but little better than guesswork were made for the board by foreign manufacturers. And, finally, the reports thus collected were "revised" and "edited" at Washington in an attempt to make them harmonize with each other and conform to conditions of production that seldom, if ever, exist.

The contrast between this result and the President's definition of what was required is grotesque, but the failure to attain the announced purpose of the inquiry does not necessarily carry with it any reflection on the ability, industry, or faithfulness of those who did the actual work of investigation. The fact is they were engaged in an undertaking that reached far beyond the limits of the possible. The difference between the domestic and foreign cost of producing wool and wool goods can not be determined for the purpose of fixing tariff rates. Criticism, if it is indulged in, should be directed to the failure to recognize the impossibility of the difference in cost formula and direct the inquiry into practical channels. If that had been done, the cost of production would not have been ignored, but would have received its proper share of attention in connection with many other factors bearing on the tariff question. The primary mistake was in making the inquiry hinge on the difference in cost formula. That placed on the board the work of accomplishing the impossible.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, for lack of time I am compelled to omit some things of importance that I desired to say, but I think I have said enough to get before the Senate the views of the minority with reference to this question, and especially to get before the Senate the general purpose and effect of the reductions proposed in the bill which the minority of the committee support.

APPENDIX A.

SCHEDULE K—WOOL, AND MANUFACTURES OF.

Further and more detailed analysis of the report of the Tariff Board on production and cost of wool (Western States), based on details published in Volume II, part 2.

The Tariff Board, in its wool report, publishes tables which show the results of the investigations made by agents of the board into the receipts and expenditures of selected flocks of sheep in the Western States and of selected farm flocks in what is termed the "Ohio region," in order to arrive at the average cost of wool production in the United States.

First, there are six tables given of the financial details of the flocks investigated in the Western States, showing the number of sheep, pounds of wool produced, and the receipts from wool and other sources; the expenditures, including labor, forage, and miscellaneous expenses; the net charge against wool per pound, and the selling price of wool per pound; the capital per head invested, and the rate of income on capital. In arriving at their conclusions, the board considered wool as the chief product, and the receipts from mutton, lambs, and so forth, are offset against costs. No interest is allowed on capital invested or on capital borrowed.

Table I, giving the above details, includes such flocks only as those where the "net charge against wool exceeds 20 cents and above per pound." As the average net charges against wool per pound of the 40 flocks included in Table I is $0.237, and the average selling price of the same wool was $0.192, the extraordinary fact is disclosed that all but one of the flocks reported in the statistics shows a loss on the capital invested ranging from three-tenths per cent to 25.4 per cent, and an average loss on capital invested of 9.7 per cent. The exceptional flock of sheep which is reported to have paid an income of 2.7 per cent on the capital invested consisted of 95,185 head, which produced 541,916 pounds of wool, or 5.90 pounds per head, which sold for $127,337.75, or 23.5 cents per pound—the highest price recorded for any of the flocks considered. The wool on each sheep averaged in value $1.33, but the average for the 438,541 sheep of the 40 flocks investigated was slightly more than $1.09 per head. The receipts, other than from the wool of the above-mentioned flock of 95,185 sheep, namely, from sale of sheep, lambs, and so forth, averaged $220,243.75, or $2.31 per head; and as the capital per head is reported in the table as $6.81, it would seem that nearly one-third of the flock must have been sold during the year upon which the report is based. The average total of all receipts for all the flocks included in Table I is $1,006,816, and the total of all expenses is $1,152,873, which shows an average loss of 9.7 per cent on the capital invested, interest not included. The report does not state the location of these flocks, and the only clew given as to location is through the price of the wool, which exceeded 20 cents per pound and averaged $0.237 per pound, showing that the wool must have been of the lighter shrinking quality. The following table shows the highest and lowest and medium results reported of four selected flocks:

TABLE I.—Net charge against wool exceeding 20 cents per pound (interest not included).

[From Tariff Board report, p. 315. Fractions of dollars omitted.]

	Number of sheep.	Pounds of wool.	Receipts. From wool.	Receipts. From other sources.	Receipts. Total.

Average of 40 flocks, Table I	$0.236	$0.182	$5.55	− 9.7
Flock A	.203	.235	6.81	2.7
Flock B	.384	.13	4.92	−25.4
Flock C	.203	.20	4.80	− 0.7
Flock D	.280	.151	5.88	−16.5

It will be noticed that the receipts and expenditures of no two flocks of sheep in the above table show similar results, and of the 40 flocks in Table I, as presented in the report of the Tariff Board, the capital invested per head varies from $3.50 to $10.03; the net charge against wool per pound varies from 20 cents to $0.384; the selling price of wool per pound varies from $0.113 to $0.235, and the rate of income on capital varies from +2.7 per cent to —25.4 per cent. The fact that any of these flockmasters continue in such a losing business casts grave doubts upon the accuracy of the figures given. Flock A, quoted above, would apparently eat up all of the capital invested in less than four years. It would hardly be possible that anyone would continue in the business under such disastrous conditions. The indications are that some of the sheepmen have been magnifying their expenditures and minimizing their receipts so as to lead the Tariff Board to find that the cost of growing wool in the Western States is much greater than it is abroad, and therefore they would be unable to exist if the protective-tariff duty on wool were increased.

By examining the figures in the above table other extraordinary discrepancies are found, as follows:

Flock.	Pounds of wool per head.	Labor per head.	Miscellaneous expenses per head.
A	5.69	$0.59	$1.47
B	4.30	.90	1.31
C	8.53	.46	.71
D	7.50	1.22	1.22

Similar divergence in results occurs with most of the 40 flocks of sheep in Table I, and the question naturally arises, how can any average be arrived at that will approach the medial sum of the cost of production of wool in the Western States? The wool per head from each flock differs greatly; the price at which the wool is sold varies; the labor cost of some flocks is over 100 per cent apart, and the miscellaneous expenses are as wide asunder as is the labor cost.

Four selected flocks from:

Flock A	.153	.217	5.30	9.3
Flock B	.156	.087	4.91	—13.9
Flock C	.188	.217	6.29	3.1
Flock D	.189	.16	5.71	— 3.3

The investigation of the 59 flocks of sheep included in Table II affords discrepancies similar to those in Table I as to details of receipts and expenditures, and the rate per cent of income on capital is nearly as divergent, though 26 of the flocks show a profit ranging from one-tenth of 1 per cent to 9.3 per cent; but the average of all the flocks is five-tenths of 1 per cent on the wrong side of the ledger, which result is brought about by 33 flocks showing a loss ranging from one-tenth of 1 per cent to 13.9 per cent.

It is remarkable that in the average for the 59 flocks included in Table II the expenditures again exceed the receipts by a small fraction, so that more than half of the flocks have been unprofitable; also, that the following discrepancies appear in the wool produced per head, in the labor expenditures per head, and in the miscellaneous expenses, as follows:

Flock.	Pounds of wool per head.	Labor per head.	Miscellaneous expenses per head.
A	7.67	$0.95	$1.22
B	9.45	.84	.80
C	6.65	.83	1.34
D	6.38	.64	1.04

Even greater differences could be found among the 59 flocks included in Table II if selection were made for that purpose; but the remarkable weight of the fleeces in flock B and the small cost of labor in flock D, and the other large difference in labor and miscellaneous expenses show that it is impossible to arrive at any approximate estimate of the cost of wool production in the Western States under the system adopted by the Tariff Board.

Four selected flocks from:

	Net charge against wool per pound.	Selling price per pound.	Capital per head.	Rate of income on capital.
				Per cent.
Average 71 flocks, Table III	$0.119	$0.151	$5.47	3.8
Flock A	.104	.135	4.78	18.1
Flock B	.148	.11	5.55	3.3
Flock C	.139	.14	3.93	0
Flock D	.148	.19	7.60	3.4

It is noticeable that the lower "net charge against wool per pound," as given in Table III, does not permit the returns of all the 71 flocks included in said table to show an income on capital, for there are 7 flocks from which no profit was secured, although the average net charge against wool per pound is reduced to $0.119, whereas in Table I the charge is $0.237, and in Table II it is $0.168. The average selling price of wool in Table I is $0.182; in Table II, $0.171, and in Table III, $0.151.

The figures for wool production per head for labor and miscellaneous expenses of the four selected flocks of sheep included in Table III are as follows:

Flock.	Pounds of wool per head.	Labor per head.	Miscellaneous expenses per head.
A	7.16	$0.48	$0.85
B	7.48	.62	.80
D	7.18	.67	1.25

It will be noticed that discrepancies exist between the details of the different flocks in Table III similar to those in Tables I and II, except that there is more uniformity in the number of pounds of wool per head; but the selling price of the wool varies exceedingly, although, apparently, the price at which the wool of a flock sells does not settle the income on capital. For instance, the wool of flock A sold for 13½ cents per pound and the rate of income on capital was 18.1 per cent, while the wool of flock D sold for 19 cents per pound and the income was but 3.4 per cent. The wool from flock B was sold for 11 cents per pound and the income was 3.3 per cent less than nothing, while the wool from flock C sold for 14 cents per pound and the income just provided for the expenditures, so the profit was zero.

Table IV makes a much better showing for the woolgrowers, with an average rate of income on capital of 10.7 per cent, the lowest being 2.7 per cent and the highest 42.1 per cent.

Four selected flocks from:

	Net charge against wool per pound.	Selling price per pound.	Capital per head.	Rate of income on capital.
				Per cent.
Average of 74 flock, Table IV	$0.077	$0.157	$5.33	10.7
Flock A	.079	.242	5.75	14.8
Flock B	.066	.21	3.48	31.2
Flock C	.097	.16	7.02	7.6
Flock D	.098	.125	5.26	2.7

Every flock in Table IV produced a profit on capital; but again equally strange figures confront us, which show an enormous difference in the profit accounts, which range from 2.7 per cent to 31.2 per cent, and there was one small flock of 408 sheep which produced 42.1 per cent income on capital. That flock is not selected from Table IV, on account of its being composed of such a small number of sheep.

Further details of the four flocks given above show the following:

Flock.	Pounds of wool per head.	Labor per head.	Miscellaneous expenses per head.
A	5.15	$0.64	$1.09
B	7.58	.53	.87
C	8.62	.78	1.32
D	6.05	.62	.96

It should be observed that when the income from flocks is greater the expenditures for labor are reduced, but the miscellaneous expenses are about the same. Comparing the flocks reported in Table IV with those in Table III, it is found that while the wool product per head is less in Table IV the selling price of the wool is higher. That would indicate that the quality or condition of the wool was better from the sheep included in Table IV, but we are confronted with the fact that the capital invested per head is less in Table IV than that invested per head in those reported in Table III, which were less remunerative.

Flock C	.014	.09	4.80	11.4

All of the 42 flocks included in Table V produced income on capital ranging from 7.4 per cent to 34.5 per cent. The selling price of wool varied from 11 cents per pound to $0.223 per pound. The 4 selected flocks in the table above gave the following further results:

Flock.	Pounds of wool per head.	Labor per head.	Miscellaneous expenses per head.
A	5.15	$0.46	$0.74
B	7.00	.41	.57
C	7.2	.77	.62
D	7.94	.58	1.22

Again, the great difference in receipts and expenditures is exhibited, so that it is impossible to arrive at the cost of producing a pound of wool. Any average based on the figures under consideration would be merely estimates.

Table VI contains the statistics of 44 flocks of sheep, all of which produced a net credit to wool—that is, the wool product of each flock more than paid expenses—and the mutton and lambs sold were more than clear gain. The income on capital ranged from 13.7 per cent to 41.8 per cent, although the average price of wool sold was less than the average price of the wool of any of the flocks considered in Tables I to V, inclusive.

The extraordinary light production of wool from flock C of less than 2½ pounds of wool per head, which sold for the same average price of all the 44 flocks included in Table VI—that is, 14 cents per pound—indicates that the small yield of wool was not caused by disease, or the quality of the wool would have suffered, and the price accordingly. It may also be said that the average weight of fleeces for the 12 Western States is about 7 pounds, and none of these States averages less than 6 pounds of wool per head. (See wool product of United States, 1910, Yearbook Department of Agriculture, p. 637.) It might be surmised that the owner of flock C, disgusted with the small yield of wool, sold off many more sheep than the average owners sold, and that would account for the large "net credit to wool per pound" and the handsome rate of income on capital of 20.6 per cent. In that event the flock would be decreased for the following year, and the statistics for the abnormal year and the small wool production of flock C should certainly not be taken as a basis for computing the cost of the wool production. As flock A produced but little over $1 per head from wool and nearly $3 per head from mutton, and so forth, and as the capital per head was $5.53, it follows that about one-third of the flock must have been sold to bring the receipts "from other sources" to the large percentage that is reported. It is unfortunate that not even the State in which the flocks are located is given in the report of the board, and therefore there is no guide to help form an opinion as to the correctness of the statistics. Everything has to be taken on faith as to the accuracy and honesty of the agents of the Tariff Board and the flock-owners and the accuracy of those who prepared the statistics, while the vast discrepancies in the result for nearly every flock in all the tables throws grave doubt on their reliability as the basis for the cost of the production of wool in the Western States.

With the settlement of the Western States the sheep and cattle ranges have been considerably restricted, and this has led to a greater number of sheep having been sent to the shambles because of the lack of free or cheap grazing land. At Chicago alone the increase in the number of sheep sent to that market was 3,500,000 in 1900 and 5,229,000 in 1910. (Tariff Board report, p. 344.) It is therefore probable that the large receipts "from other sources"—mutton and lamb, and so forth—for the years covered by the Tariff Board's statistics have been considerably beyond the normal, and have therefore augmented the receipts of the flockmasters from that source at the expense of the future size of the flocks. Lack of free or cheap grazing land and the high price of mutton, together with the lower price of wool, was bound to have such an effect on the sheep industry, and has no doubt added to the difficulty of the Tariff Board in arriving at the average upon which it relies to prove the cost of wool production. If the statistics compiled by the board had included, say, the last 10 years instead of just 1 year, and had shown similar percentages of receipts " from other sources," as in the six tables considered, such evidence would have, in a measure, confirmed the findings of the board, or have shown conclusively that a one year's average does not furnish sufficient data upon which to base the cost of production in the Western States.

In arriving at the average cost of production of wool in the Western States, and in the estimates of the cost of production in Australia and South America, the board seems to have involved other years with the year for which their statistics are supposed to report. On page 308, the report, in speaking of the Western States, says:

> The study was commenced in Texas in February, 1911, and during the ensuing six months the operations of some 500 different concerns, representing almost every phase of the business in the various Western States, were placed under personal examination.

That period would be from February, 1911, to July, 1911, inclusive. On page 333 the report says:

> Unless otherwise indicated, the statistics here presented are for the year 1909–10, and those given for the United States apply only to the region west of the Missouri River.

That period would seem to be for the parts of two years previous to the year when "the study was commenced in Texas in February, 1911." Then, on the same page, 333, the report says:

> In our Western States the investment in the flock is $4.40 per head, and in Australia and South America $4 and $2.75, respectively. These are the values obtained during the early months of 1909. Since then the sheep industry of the United States has undergone decided depression, with the result of a shrinkage of flock values, in some cases amounting to 25 to 50 per cent. In Australia, on the contrary, the industry has been in a highly flourishing condition, and this has created a strong demand for stock sheep; so that there has probably been some increase in the average value of the flock. And in South America the industry has continued to flourish, and the flock values have remained practically unchanged.

It would appear, therefore, that the three years 1909–1911 are involved in the statistics, and, as the sheep industry and the price of wool and mutton have undergone decided depression during that period, it is important to know the particular year which each set of statistics represents. However, the Tariff Board evidently has arrived at the conclusion that it is not important, as far as comparison between this country and Australia and South America goes, to confine the statistics to one particular year; for, on page 333, the report says:

> It has not been possible, nor has the board deemed it necessary, to present detailed tables of costs for these countries, as has been done in the case of the United States. And while the statistics of comparative costs presented in the following pages are, for the most part, based on information collected in the countries concerned by special agents or representatives of the board, it should be remembered that from the nature of things this information is not so complete as that collected for the United States, and that consequently the statistics partake more of the nature of estimates or approximations than do those given for the United States. The board believes, however, that the statistics of costs presented are sufficiently typical and closely enough approximate the costs incurred during normal seasons and under conditions necessitating no abnormal expenses to bring out the comparative conditions existing in the United States and these other countries.

The object of this branch of the investigations of the Tariff Board is supposed to be the discovery of the difference in the cost of production of wool here and abroad, so that the tariff on wool may be adjusted according to the facts, which, of course, must be accurate and concomitant to be conclusive; whereas the board admits that the statistics of the cost of foreign wool "partake more of the nature of estimates or approximations," so that the theory of discovering the difference in the cost of production of wool fails because of the inadequacy of the basic facts necessary for a fair comparison of the cost here and abroad.

WOOLGROWING IN THE EASTERN UNITED STATES.

Under the head of woolgrowing in the eastern United States the Tariff Board confines its statistics principally to merino sheep or merino crossed with mutton sheep, and mainly covers the Ohio region, where the growers place their "chief emphasis on wool production." Here again the board encountered numerous snags in arriving at the cost of production of both wool and mutton, and therefore confined its investigations mainly to those sections of the Ohio region which include parts of Ohio and adjacent parts of Pennsylvania and West Virginia and certain counties of southern Michigan, where the flocks are mostly thoroughbred merino sheep or half or quarter bred merino. The Ohio region is the head center of the Woolgrowers' Association—for whose benefit the Dingley and the Aldrich-Payne tariff bills on wool were framed—who, in spite of the 10 to 33 cents per pound duty, equal to from 97.57 to 43.38 per cent ad valorem under the imports of 1911, are asking for greater protection. According to the statistics of the board this high protection does not seem high enough to give a "reasonable profit" to many of the growers. The statistics included in Table XIII of the Tariff Board report, from which four flocks of sheep are selected, give the following details:

Four selected flocks from:

[1] Average.

There are the same discrepancies between the cost of production of wool in the above table and all the tables for the Eastern States as are shown in the tables for the Western States; for it will be noticed that the expense of keeping sheep varies from $1.46 per head to $4.60 per head, and even allowing only the average cost of production of grain and hay fed to the flock, there is not one flock included in Tables XIII and XIV—and some of the flocks in Table XV—that shows a profit to the owners. If the market price of grain and hay is charged against the flock the loss would be much greater; but, of course, in that case the farmer makes a profit on the difference between the producing price and the market price of the grain and hay. But if the farmer had no sheep he would secure the difference in value between the hay and grain raised and the price it could be sold for less the expense of marketing.

Table XIV—Net charges against wool per pound 30 cents and under 35 cents per pound—is nearly a repetition of Table XIII, except that the statistics show that the average expense per head is $2.59 instead of $2.81, as stated in Table XIII, and the net charge against wool per pound on the basis of the average cost of production of the grain and hay fed to the sheep is $0.32 instead of $0.40, as in Table XIII. Again, no flock shows a profit, although the cost of the grain and hay fed to produce a pound of wool averaged 8 cents per pound less than the average given in Table XIII, and the wool was sold for only 1 cent less per pound than the wool from the 32 flocks included in Table XIII. It would be interesting to know how it is that the hay and grain cost less per pound of wool in Table XIV than in Table XIII, and 5 cents less in Table XV; and even more extraordinary, the cost is reduced to a net charge against wool per pound of $0.12 in Table XVII. Those extraordinary differences in the net charges against the wool produced, on the basis of the cost of feeding the sheep, from 40 cents per pound of wool to 12 cents per pound, is even more extraordinary in the statistics of Table XVIII, where there is an average net credit of 6 cents per pound of wool; that is, the wool of each flock paid all the expenses and in addition returned a profit of from 1 cent per pound up to 21 cents, or an average for all the flock of 6 cents on each pound of wool produced.

The statistics on the crossbred sheep given in Table XIX shows an average net credit to wool per pound on the basis of average cost of production of grain and hay fed to the sheep of 2 cents, and more than half of the flocks included show such net credit ranging from 1 cent to 65 cents per pound.

The following table, which is a synopsis of the costs and receipts of all the tables now being considered, shows where profits began, namely, in Table XVI, when the charge per head is lowest, and rises from this point as the profit increases.

TABLE XXIII.

Table.	Net charge per pound of wool.	Net charge per head.	Receipts per head.
			Wool.	Other sources.	Total.
XIII.....	35 cents and above.....	$2.81	$1.64	$0.46	$2.10
XIV.....	30 cents and under 35 cents.....	2.59	1.73	.51	2.24
XV.....	25 cents and under 30 cents.....	2.50	1.77	.71	2.49
XVI.....	20 cents and under 25 cents.....	2.27	1.89	.77	2.66
XVII....	Under 20 cents.....	2.36	1.94	1.44	3.38
XVIII...	Net credit.....	2.81	1.99	3.29	5.29
XIX.....	Crossbred.....	2.78	1.47	2.93	4.38

The report of the Tariff Board shows that when the crossbred flocks (Table XIX) are considered, nearly all show greater receipts from mutton and lambs than from wool, the receipts from those sources constituting about two-thirds of the total receipts, while the average of the merino flocks show receipts from mutton and lambs a little less than one-third of the total receipts. The average cost per head of maintenance of the crossbred sheep is $2.78, and the average receipts from other sources than wool are $2.92, or a balance of 16 cents in favor of the farmer, which, added to the average receipts of $1.46 per head from wool, produces a total of $1.62 per head as profit.

In the case of the merino flocks the average maintenance costs per head are $2.44, and the average receipts from other sources per head are only about $1.07, leaving a difference of $1.37 to be covered by the average receipts from wool; and, since these amount to $1.88 per head, there remains 50 cents per head as average profit. (Vol. II, pt. 2, p. 373, report of Tariff Board.)

In considering the comparative cost of producing wool in England, France, and Germany the evidence submitted is vague and inconclusive. As to England, the board says:

Estimates made especially for the board by a prominent English authority show that about one-fifth of the total receipts from the flock are derived from wool and that the average yield per head of sheep is about 5 pounds of wool, worth about $1, and one lamb, worth about $5; and since this same authority estimates that the entire costs per head of sheep, including labor costs, are about $4.16, it is seen that English sheep husbandry is fairly profitable. (Vol. II, pt. 2, p. 374.)

Concerning France, in speaking of the Rambouillet sheep and the Dishley merino, produced by crossing the merino with an English mutton type, the board says:

In certain famous flocks visited by an agent of the board the sheep were shearing as high as from 9 to 11 pounds of fine medium wool, bringing the grower, in 1910, from 18 to 20 cents a pound, and lambs worth, when fat, from $8 to $10. Owing to the fact that in France sheep are usually run on higher priced land than in England, the costs of production per sheep are somewhat higher; but this difference is quite made up by the fineness of the fleece and the high price of mutton, so that, measured by the net returns per head of sheep, flock husbandry is possibly more profitable in France than in England. (Vol. II, pt. 2, pp. 374–375.)

Concerning Germany, the board reports, apparently without any definite information, as follows:

In those regions of Germany where conditions have been favorable and the emphasis has been shifted from wool to mutton, conditions approach those in France. But the readjustment has not been carried so far, and many German flock owners still raise the fine-wool sheep, which barely pay for their keep. (Vol. II, pt. 2, p. 375.)

In summing up the wool situation, the board says:

In the western region of the United States, with approximately 35,000,000 sheep, the net charge against a pound of wool is about 11 cents. In other sections, with about 15,000,000 sheep, the net charge against a pound of wool from the merino sheep, which number approximately 5,000,000, is about 19 cents, and the net charge against the wool grown on sheep of the crossbred type is negligible.

On an average for the United States as a whole the net charge against a pound of "fine" wool is a fraction over 12 cents.

Accepting 19 cents as the average charge against a pound of wool of a distinctly fine or fine-medium character grown in the farming States, 11 cents as a fair average for the Western States, and assuming that on an average the smaller farm flocks of a distinctly mutton or coarse-wool type pay for their own wool, and giving each class its approximate relative weight in the calculation, a general average for the entire clip of the country, all grades included, would be about 9½ cents per pound.

While the expenses in the United States during the year under review were fully up to the average for a series of years, the receipts fell below the average. It is but fair, therefore, to assume that the estimated income of 6.2 per cent should, under normal receipts, be considerably increased. There is no contingency, however, in sight that can by any possibility place domestic growers on an equality in the matter of costs with their competitors in South America, Australasia, and the Cape Colonies. (Vol. II, pt. 2, pp. 376–377.)

It is greatly to be regretted that after all the time, labor, and expense which the Tariff Board has consumed the President and the Congress are far from being informed as to the comparative cost of production of wool here and abroad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert as a substitute the following words:

That the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of the paragraphs of schedule K of section 1 of said act, from 360 to 395, inclusive, and inserting in place thereof the following:

1. All wools, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals shall be divided for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon, into the three following classes:

2. Class 1, that is to say, Merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools or other wools of Merino blood immediate or remote, down clothing wools, and combing wools of like character with any of the preceding, including Bagdad wool, China lamb's wool, Castel Branco, Adrianople skin wool or butcher's wool, and such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Aires, New Zealand, Egypt, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, Morocco, and elsewhere, and Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used, and all wools not hereinafter provided for in class 3.

3. Class 2, that is to say, all hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animal, not hereinafter provided for in class 3.

4. Class 3, that is to say, Donskol, Native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, Native Smyrna, Russian camel's hair, and all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for.

5. The standard samples of all wools or hair which are now, or may be hereafter, deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classification of wools and hair under this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to renew these standards, and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other customhouses of the United States when they may be needed.

6. Whenever wools of class 3 shall have been improved by the admixture of Merino or English blood, from their present character, as represented by the standard samples, now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty as class 1.

7. If any bale or package of wool or hair specified in this act shall be entered as class 3, and shall contain a greater percentage of class 1 wool, or class 2 hair, than does the proper standard sample thereof, then the whole bale or package shall be subject to the rate of duty chargeable on wool of class 1, or hair of class 2, as the case may be; and if any bale or package shall be entered by the importer, or anyone duly authorized to make entry thereof, as shoddy, mungo, flocks, wool, hair, or other material, of any class specified in this act, and such bale or package shall contain any admixture of any one or more of the foregoing, or of any other material, subject to a higher rate of duty, the whole bale or package shall be dutiable at the highest rate imposed by this act upon any article or material in said bale or package.

8. Whenever in any paragraph of this act the word "wool" is used in connection with the material or manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of sheep, camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animal, whether manufactured by the woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.

9. The duty on all wools of class 1 shall be, if scoured, 19 cents per pound; if in the grease, or in any other condition than scoured and not advanced by any process of manufacture, 18 cents per pound on the clean wool, which shall be ascertained by scouring or other tests made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That in no event shall the duty exceed 45 per cent ad valorem.

10. The duty on all hair of class 2 shall be, if scoured, 8 cents per pound. If in natural condition or any other condition than scoured, and not advanced by any process of manufacture, 7 cents per pound on the clean hair, which shall be ascertained by scouring or other tests made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That in no event shall the duty exceed 30 per cent ad valorem.

11. The duty on all wools and camel's hair of class 3 shall be, if scoured, 6 cents per pound. If in their natural condition or any other condition than scoured, and not advanced by any process of manufacture, 5 cents per pound on the clean wool or hair, which shall be ascertained by scouring or other tests made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That in no event shall the duty exceed 40 per cent ad valorem.

12. The duty on wools or hair on the skin shall be 2 cents per pound less than is imposed upon the clean wool or hair of class 1, 2, or 3, as the case may be, imported not on the skin and unscoured, the quantity and value to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

13. Top waste and slubbing waste, 20 cents per pound.

14. Roving waste, ring waste, and garneted waste, 16 cents per pound.

15. Noils, carbonized, 14 cents per pound; uncarbonized, 11 cents per pound.

16. Thread waste, yarn waste, and wool wastes not herein specified, shoddy, mungo, and wool extract, 7 cents per pound.

17. Woolen rags and flocks, 3 cents per pound.

18. Combed wool or tops made wholly or in part of wool or camel's hair, valued at not more than 20 cents per pound, 12 cents per pound on the wool contained therein; valued at more than 20 cents per pound and not more than 30 cents per pound, 16 cents per pound on the wool contained therein; valued at more than 30 cents per pound and not more than 40 cents per pound, 18 cents per pound on the wool contained therein; valued at more than 40 cents per pound and not more than 50 cents per pound, 20 cents per pound on the wool contained therein; valued above 50 cents per pound, 21 cents per pound on the wool contained therein. That on all the foregoing in this paragraph mentioned there shall be paid an additional duty of 5 per cent ad valorem.

19. Wool and hair which has been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the scoured condition but less advanced than yarn and not specially provided for in this act, 20 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 5 per cent ad valorem.

20. On yarns made wholly or in part of wool valued at not more than 30 cents per pound the duty shall be 14 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 12 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 30 cents per pound and not more than 50 cents per pound the duty shall be 18 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 15 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 50 cents per pound and not more than 80 cents per pound the duty shall be 21 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 20 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 80 cents per pound the duty shall be 24 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 25 per cent ad valorem.

26. This act shall take effect on the 1st day of January, 1913.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter upon a general discussion of the history of this most interesting subject. It is rich in material for debate. Under other circumstances I would be very glad to recall to the attention of the Senate and the country the wonderful analysis of the wool schedule given to the Senate by my late colleague, Mr. Dolliver, when the revision of 1909 was before the Senate. I pause long enough, however, to say that the investigation of the Tariff Board and its report, which we now have before us, vindicate every assertion made by that great statesman and point unerringly to the revision of the schedule that should take place, just as he pointed to it with his rare prescience three years ago. When I remember the attitude of the Senate respecting the wool schedule at that time and compare it with the advices that we have received from the Tariff Board, I feel like paying tribute to his memory, because his marvelous study then so closely approximates the study of the Tariff Board since. While I do not agree with the Tariff Board in every respect, I at once concede that it has put the Senate and the country into possession of information most valuable and most necessary for the construction of a schedule respecting duties upon wool and the manufactures of wool. I intend to follow, however, as I understand it, the report of the Tariff Board so far as it presents facts. I do so hoping that other Senators upon this side of the Chamber, who profess a willingness to be guided by the advice and the information given and collected by the Tariff Board, will look with some favor upon the amendment I have proposed.

I can not vote for the House bill. I can not vote for it, because, while I have no doubt it is effective from the standpoint of the political organization that is sponsor for it, in my opinion it does not reach the protective point; and, as I explained when the metal schedule was under debate, my conviction politically and economically is that we ought to preserve duties upon competitive commodities that will enable the domestic manufacturers to reach and fill the American market at a fair, reasonable profit.

The duty of the House bill upon wool is 20 per cent. There are some wools that are grown in the United States that would be amply protected by a duty of 20 per cent, but, in my judgment, by far the greater part of the wool production in this country could not sustain the reduction proposed in the House bill. If we are to take—and I think we might well take—the statement of the Tariff Board in that respect, the average foreign price, or London price, of scoured wool during the period passed over by the board was about 40 cents per pound. Twenty per cent upon scoured wool would be 8 cents per pound; 20 per cent upon the wools sold abroad at 30 cents per pound would be 6 cents per pound. There are a great many pounds of wool sold in the foreign market and imported into the United States of less value than 30 cents per scoured pound. I do not criticize my friends upon the other side of the Chamber for attaching a duty of 20 per cent upon wool, because, as I understand—as I gather from the report of the Committee on Ways and Means which accompanied the bill—it was intended to invite additional importations from other countries. It was not intended to preserve, to the degree which we now preserve them, the markets of the United States to home-grown wool. Concerning that political doctrine I enter upon no discussion at the present time. I merely say that the point fixed by the House bill is so far below the point of reasonable protection that it is impossible for me to give it my support.

On the manufactures of wool I think the House bill is higher proportionately than upon wool itself. The duties upon the manufactures of wool in that bill approach more nearly the protective point than does the duty upon the original product, but, nevertheless, in each instance which I have examined—and I have examined a great many of them with exceeding care and compared them with the report of the Tariff Board—I find that one viewing the subject from the standpoint of adequately protecting American industry can not assert fairly, nor have I heard it asserted by anyone who espouses the bill, that these duties will measure the difference between the conditions here and abroad, or, in other words, the difference between the cost of production here and abroad. I say this much in order that it may be fully understood that, while I rank myself second to no one in a desire to secure a substantial reduction in the duties of the wool schedule, I can not bring myself to support or approve the House bill.

It is therefore, Mr. President, that I have offered the amendment which has just been read, and without any desire to occupy the time of the Senate with any partisan discussion, without any desire to bring into the debate the least partisan feeling, I intend to state as plainly and simply as I can the reasons which have led me to believe that the amendment which I have proposed will at once very greatly diminish the unjust burdens which the American people for years have been compelled to bear and fairly protect the woolgrowing industry and the manufactures of wool.

In the beginning allow me to say that I recognize the amendment which I have proposed contains some duties—I may say with frankness many duties—that are somewhat higher than are required by the terms of the report of the Tariff Board. I have been led to take this course because I recognize that there are differences of opinion with respect to the proper conclusions to be drawn from the report, and I have a real hope that these differences of opinion may be bridged and that we can secure at this session of Congress, not all the relief to which the people of the country are fairly entitled, but a measure of the relief to which they are entitled. I will say in this connection that I stand ready to vote for any measure that will reduce the duties of this schedule, provided they are not reduced below what I believe to be the fair protective point. I ask now a consideration of the amendment which I have proposed.

It begins with a duty of 18 cents per pound upon the real or clean wool—that is, substantially, scoured wool. In my judgment, a fair deduction from the facts stated by the Tariff Board would permit a duty as low as 15 cents per pound upon clean wool.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, what is the duty now?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no duty now upon——

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the equivalent duty?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a duty of 33 cents per pound upon scoured wool, but the duty which is put upon substantially all the wool imported is a duty in the grease—a duty upon the grease pound instead of upon the clean pound.

Mr. SMOOT. Of 11 cents a pound.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of 11 cents a pound upon class 1 wool. Before I go further, however, with the suggestion I have just made, I think I ought to say that in the amendment which I have offered, the wools have been somewhat reclassified, but only to this extent: I have taken—and I have followed distinguished authority in so doing—all the wools out of class 2 and have put them in class 1, so that in class 2 there are no wools, that class being confined to the hair of the camel, the goat, the alpaca, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That, of course, is done for the reason that all the duties in that class are based upon the scoured content of the wool.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. One of the great faults of the present law respecting the duty on wool is that it is inflexible; that 11 cents per pound is laid without regard to the shrinkage or the value of the wool. That is one of the complaints most constantly and most justly made against the existing wool tariff, namely, that the duty is so high that the importation of low-priced wool—high-shrinking wool—is prohibited.

There is no great difference between 18 cents a pound upon the clean content and the present duty on wool in so far as the high-priced or the low-shrinking wools are concerned, but I have attempted to so adjust the duty that the low-priced wools, the high-shrinking wools, which can be used for the cheaper cloths and fabrics, may enter the country upon a fair basis. Therefore I have provided that, although the duty on first-class wools shall be 18 cents per pound, no duty shall be levied in excess of 45 per cent ad valorem. The existing duty of 11 cents and 12 cents per pound upon many of the wools that might be used for clothing is now, when rendered into an ad valorem 80 per cent, 100 per cent, and sometimes more than 100 per cent, and therefore these wools are entirely excluded. This amendment fixes an absolute limit, so that in no event can there be more than 45 per cent laid upon the clean wool in such importations. This will, I think, enable a considerable quantity of low-priced wools to enter our market and be used by our manufacturers for the production of the cheaper class of garments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do; but I want to say that I presume a great many other Senators desire to speak. I yield to the Senator from Utah now, but in that connection I desire to state that I hope I may be allowed to finish my remarks without interruptions that will consume a great amount of time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I recognize the propriety of the suggestion of the Senator, and I certainly have no desire to interrupt him at all. I thought I would call his attention to a few figures at that point before he left it, but I will not do so at this particular time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said a few moments ago that a duty of 15 cents per pound on clean wool might be well assumed from the Tariff Board's report, and I desire to read just a word with respect to that point from the report. I first read an extract from volume 2, page 376. In this extract the board attempts to sum up the cost of producing wool in the United States. It says:

> In the western region of the United States, with approximately 35,000,000 sheep, the net charge against a pound of wool is about 11 cents. In the other sections, with about 15,000,000 sheep, the net charge against a pound of wool from the merino sheep, which number approximately 5,000,000, is about 19 cents, and the net charge against the wool grown on sheep of the crossbred type is negligible.
> Accepting 19 cents as the average charge against a pound of wool of a distinctly fine or fine medium character grown in the farming States, 11 cents as a fair average for the Western States, and assuming that on an average the smaller farm flocks of a distinctly mutton or coarse wool type pay for their own wool, and giving each class its approximate relative weight in the calculation, a general average for the entire clip of the country, all grades included, would be about 9½ cents per pound.

I do not want it to be understood that I agree with the theory which is here stated by the Tariff Board; I have views of my own in respect to the proper way in which to arrive at a result if I were seeking the cost of producing wool in this country; but, for the purposes of this amendment and this discussion, I accept not only the theory of the Tariff Board, but I accept its conclusions upon the facts which it collected as well. We therefore have in the United States an average cost of producing wool of 9½ cents per pound. Let us now see what the cost abroad is. I turn to the same volume, at page 350, where the report says:

> There remains, therefore, only the simple operation of subtracting from the flock expenses the receipts from other sources than wool, to reveal the fact that as against a clearly demonstrated net charge against the western American wool of from 10 to 11 cents, there is probably not more than 4 to 5 cents per pound against the South American clip; and, if the season is normal and the sheep market steady, little, if any, charge against the Australian. Indeed, well managed stations in many parts of Australia are showing at the present time a profit before any wools are sold.

A similar remark could be made with regard to many of the woolgrowers in the United States.

> It is not safe to assume, however, that the more remote runs are doing so well, and there is always the possibility of paralyzing droughts.
>
> In the light, therefore, of the best information to be obtained, the board believes that at the present time the entire Australian output of merino and crossbred wool (interest being left out of account, as in the case of the United States) is moving to market, under present receipts from sales of sheep, with a net average charge of but a few cents per pound; and this estimate apparently holds good of New Zealand and the African Cape as well.

We have here collected, therefore, the South American competitors, the Australian competitors, the African competitors, and the New Zealand competitors, and these are substantially all the competitors of the United States, so far as class 1 wool is concerned. The board says with regard to Australia, New Zealand, and the African Cape that a few cents per pound may be regarded as the cost in those countries. That is rather an indefinite statement; no one knows what is meant by "a few cents per pound"; but it is perfectly safe, I think, to assume that when the board declared that these costs were a few cents per pound, it did not mean to say that they were less than 2½ cents per pound. Therefore I have taken 2½ cents per pound as the cost in these three countries; 4½ cents per pound for the cost in South America, and the result is as the average for those four countries of 3½ cents per pound. Deducted from our cost of 9½ cents per pound, there remains a difference of 6 cents per pound, which, according to the protective doctrine advocated by the party to which I belong, must be covered by a duty.

The shrinkage of American wool, according to the report of the Tariff Board, is substantially 60 per cent. When, therefore, we are attempting to convert a difference of 6 cents per pound in the grease into a difference in scoured or clean wool, we find that the difference is 15 cents per pound. Mathematically that is the conclusion to be drawn from the report of the Tariff Board, and while I am perfectly willing to take these facts, I have not been willing to accept the conclusion which many people draw from those facts.

I have believed that it would be safer and better to advance the duty on scoured wool to 18 cents. Why? First, the system of averages adopted by the Tariff Board is most misleading. I am not criticizing the Tariff Board. I do not know any other way in which it could ever arrive at a conclusion, grouping all the fields of production together. It says that there is a part of this country in which wool costs nothing, and, of course, you all know how it reaches that conclusion. It credits up to the account the entire revenue from the sheep, other than wool, and deducting that from the entire cost, in some cases there is a credit rather than a debit to the cost of the wool. In other parts of the country similarly computed there is a cost of 12 cents; in other parts, 11 cents; in other parts, 19 cents. Thus, you can see at once how utterly impossible it is to deduce from those facts any mathematical conclusion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certanly.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the Senator at all, I understand the Senator to state that the Tariff Board found that in some parts of the country it costs nothing whatever to produce wool, and that it arrives at that conclusion by charging the cost up to the other parts of the sheep. Is that the idea?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the theory of the Tariff Board.

Mr. REED. In other words, if it costs a certain amount on a flock of a thousand sheep, and the total product of that flock exceeds the total cost, they then draw the conclusion that the wool costs nothing.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator states it correctly.

Mr. REED. And that is the intelligent, highly scientific Tariff Board that Congress is expected to blindly follow, and that is the board in respect to which the President practically said to Congress it had to be heard from before Congress could be permitted to act at all upon tariff matters.

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean to say, Mr. President, that while I am not satisfied with that theory of reaching costs, yet that theory is the one which most greatly tends to a reduction of the tariff duties, because every item of revenue is credited against the entire cost of the business, leaving only what remains as the cost of producing the article under consideration.

I have often wondered, however, how we would proceed if we were endeavoring to ascertain the proper duty on mutton. Then, of course, the same way of dealing with this subject would require the Tariff Board to consider the wool as a by-product and credit it up to the cost of maintaining the sheep, whatever was obtained from the wool, leaving the cost of mutton as the remainder. However, I do not think the Senator from Missouri can justly complain of it, because it reduces the cost to the lowest possible point.

Mr. REED. The Senator's suggestion is just what I had in mind, and now it occurs to me that if we can get the Tariff Board to figure this proposition from both ends—that is, from the mutton end as well—they will easily demonstrate that it costs nothing to raise mutton, adding the cost to the wool, and then when they figure the wool end of the proposition they can show that it costs nothing to raise wool. Then we will have our sheep free of cost entirely, and I should think every good tariff protectionist would feel now, in view of that method of figuring, that really Congress ought to lay aside its constitutional duties to bring forward revenue measures and, following the suggestion of the President in his wool veto message, blindly accept the findings of this great board.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. I feel that I must ask the Senator from Missouri a question at this point. If he were endeavoring to ascertain the cost of wool and found that it cost $5 a year to support a sheep, how would he go about ascertaining how much it cost to raise the wool on the sheep? I ask for information, because I confess I have found it a very difficult problem.

Mr. REED. I think, Mr. President, the only way it could be honestly arrived at would be to take the entire cost of rearing the sheep and maintaining it and take the entire revenue derived from the sheep, and then apportion the cost to the production. I can see no other way in which anybody could do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the way the Tariff Board had in mind, and rejected it because it made the cost too great.

Mr. REED. The Tariff Board, if it limited itself to furnishing the facts and permitted Congress to do the thinking, might be of some use, but if I understand the last remark of the Senator it implies nothing more or less than this: The Tariff Board started to arrive at a certain conclusion, and they figured so as to reach that conclusion. If the Tariff Board is proceeding in that way, then certainly its conclusions are very unreliable.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I am surprised at the statement made by the Senator from Missouri, and yet perhaps not altogether surprised, because I do not believe he knows anything about the raising of sheep.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to reply to that personal remark, I imagine that in the estimation of the Senator from Utah I do not know very much about anything; and I sometimes think that he considers himself the sole repository of all human knowledge, and I am inclined to concur in that opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator's opinion in that particular is of the same value as his opinion with respect to a good many other things, then I will concur in it, but there is no such thought in my mind.

If all sheep were alike, and all sheep weighed the same number of pounds per head, and each sheep sheared the same number of pounds of wool, and all sheep ate the same amount of feed, then the argument of the Senator from Missouri would stand. But why is it that it costs nothing for raising wool in one place and 12 cents in another?

These are the facts, Mr. President: There are certain sections of the country that raise large-boned sheep. They raise them for mutton only—or, in other words, I may modify that by saying particularly for mutton—and those sheep shear a very few pounds of wool. The wool is loose. It carries no grease, and it is very coarse; and, therefore, whenever they raise a sheep it weighs almost twice what a fine-wool sheep weighs. Therefore when you figure the cost of the wool, of course the mutton itself and the increase in the herd pay for the running expenses of the whole herd, and whatever wool they have there is absolute profit.

On the other hand, 65 per cent of the sheep of this country are in the Rocky Mountain country. They are fine-wool sheep; they are not as large bodied as mutton sheep; they are raised for the wool, and average about 7 or 8 pounds of wool to the head, and when they sell for mutton they do not bring as much for it as the larger-bodied sheep raised for mutton only.

Therefore the Tariff Board could arrive at no other plan to bring the information to this body than they did. It would be absolutely impossible to do it, and that is how they arrived at the cost of wool.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator is not going to extend his remarks very long.

Mr. SMOOT. I am satisfied with that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to finish my reasons——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to say just a word? It occurs to me that in figuring the cost of raising sheep the cost and expense ought to be apportioned pro rata to the wool and the mutton in the sheep, and these sheep that the Senator from Utah speaks about are raised out in a country where they do not feed much hay; they go on the big ranges, while the sheep that we have here in the Eastern States we have to winter and feed them half the year, and it is utterly unfair for the Tariff Board to charge it all to mutton and nothing to the wool.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that the only way to arrive at any definite conclusion is to treat them on the same system. If you are going to treat one section that way, you must treat the other. They have treated the sheep in Australia under this system, and the sheep in all sections of this country, and that is the only way you can arrive at a just conclusion.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me one word? The logic of the Senator from Utah is this: If a sheep weighs more than, let us say—to use an arbitrary figure—150 pounds, then you charge his entire cost to the mutton; but if he weighs less than that, then you charge him to the wool.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah is abundantly able to attend to himself, and therefore I shall not attempt to——

Mr. SMOOT. My attention was diverted, and I did not hear what the Senator from Missouri said, and I care very little what he did say.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the peace and serenity of the wool debate will not be marred or disturbed by any angry feelings between Senators.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It would not be lamblike.

Mr. CUMMINS. Or even sheeplike.

I must say for the Tariff Board that it is not fairly subject to the criticism of the Senator from Missouri. The Tariff Board has given us the facts, and we can all employ whatever theory we please with regard to those facts. It has, I think, performed a very valuable service with respect to this subject; and while I do not agree with that theory, yet I am frank to say that when I come to substitute any of my own I am hardly less dissatisfied with my own than I am dissatisfied with that of the Tariff Board. But the fact is that when an average is taken between no cost, 11 cents a pound, 12 cents a pound, and 19 cents a pound, and when the protectionist prepares his duties on the line of that average, to use the language of a friend who occasionally is more graphic, possibly, than classical, we put somebody in the scrap pile.

The man who raises wool at a cost of 12 cents a pound can not be protected upon the hypothesis that it is costing him only 9½ cents, and those who raise their wool at a cost of 15 cents or 19 cents a pound are much less protected by the adoption of the same rule. Therefore, inasmuch as the real trouble in this country with the wool tariff is not the duty of 11 cents a pound upon the high-priced or the low-shrinking wool, but the abnormal, unnecessary, and the indefensible duties upon the low-priced and high-shrinking wool, I have been entirely willing to advance this mathematical deduction to 18 cents a pound upon these wools, with a maximum always of 45 per cent.

More than that, the woolgrower in this country is now and has always been the victim of a delusion so far as duties are concerned. He does not receive and never has received the benefit of the duties that we have imposed upon his competitive production. He will not receive the duties that we are, if we pass this amendment, imposing upon his competitive product. The woolgrower is to some extent at the mercy of the wool manufacturer.

We produce in this country about two-thirds of the wool we actually use. We import the other third. The woolgrower can not export his wool. He can not reach the markets of the Old World and there compete with the producers of Australia, South America, and Africa, and therefore his market is circumscribed by his very conditions, and the wool buyer can give him just what it pleases him to give, subject, of course, to the natural laws of trade.

This is easily proven by the fact, as shown by the Tariff Board—and it is not disputed—that over a long period the average price of scoured wool in London, with the duty added, was 51 cents per pound. During the same period and for the same kind of wool the American producer received 41 cents a pound.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator will pardon me just an interruption, and I will not interrupt him again.

The Senator has just said the farmer or the wool producer has not received the benefit of this tariff.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ought to have said the full benefit.

Mr. REED. And that he will not?

Mr. CUMMINS. He does not receive the benefit of the full duty.

Mr. REED. That, of course, is quite a different thing, and I accept it. But if it be true that the wool is being sold in foreign markets for more than is paid here, then does not that bring us back to the original statement of the Senator, that there is in fact no benefit coming to the wool producer; that he is at the mercy of the manufacturers of this country; and if so, why levy any tariff upon wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. He receives some benefit from the wool tariff. When I say he is at the mercy of the wool buyer, I mean just what I say, but I do not mean that the wool buyer can take his wool from him without paying him anything for it. I mean that according to the course of business over a long period of years in this country the woolgrower has received about one-half the full duty—that is to say, his wool has been enhanced in price by about one-half the duty and not the full duty, and, therefore, when we attach a duty of 18 cents per pound upon class 1 wool the woolgrower iin this country, in my opinion, will not receive its full advantage.

These are the reasons which have led me to adopt 18 cents per pound as the basis of my amendment, but it must not be forgotten that this is a very material reduction in the duties on wool as a whole as compared with the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. As I said a few moments ago, the duties of the Payne-Aldrich law on the low-priced and high-shrinking wools has prohibited their importation. But with the maximum of 45 per cent many of these wools will be imported, and those who most deserve consideration at the hands of Congress will receive it by this change in the wool duty.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator passes from that, I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ascertain whether from his investigation, the result of which he has stated, as to the different conditions which vary so materially the cost of the production of wool, both as to locality and through other conditions, it is not a necessary conclusion that it is practically an impossibility to ascertain accurately the difference of cost in this country and in other countries, the cost of production in other countries varying as it does in this country, the same problem being found when you come to ascertain what is the cost of production in those countries as when you try to ascertain what is the cost of production in this country.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Georgia entirely. A few years ago I started on this quest with high hope and great confidence. I believed that the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad should be adopted as the measure of protective duties. I have been disappointed. Further study has destroyed the illusion which I then held. I do not believe it is possible to ascertain with accuracy the difference between the cost of producing commodities abroad and at home. I do not believe it is possible to ascertain the difference between the cost in different industries at home, and therefore necessarily we can not ascertain what it is abroad.

Mr. BACON. The Senator says "accurately." I presume that the Senator would enlarge it and say even approximately.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. There is a certain approximation we can reach, and I think we will have to content ourselves with that approximation.

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, because I want to get his view on the subject. The Senator spoke about an average cost, with a view to the adjustment of the tariff rate to such an average.

Now, of course, if the theory is to be maintained in practice, the purpose is to adjust the tariff in such a way—to accept the protective theory as a correct one—that it may substantially be of equal benefit to all those concerned.

Take the figures suggested by the Senator, some of which go as high as 19 or 20 cents, and in other instances, according to the theory of the Tariff Board, the cost amounting to nothing, being represented by zero. Of course, if an average between the two should be taken arbitrarily, not according to the difference in the figures, but according to the different classes, and, say, the figure was put at 14 or 15 cents as an average, of course all producers whose cost should exceed that would get nothing, and all those who were below that, in proportion to their remoteness from that figure, would get more than they were entitled to. So it would seem to be an extremely partial and unsatisfactory adjustment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree that it is a very unsatisfactory method, but it is the best method we have. No other has been discovered. I shall hail with great delight some new rule, if it can be found.

I pass now from class 1 wools to class 2, which, in my amendment, relates only to hair of the camel and alpaca and goat, and so forth, and as we do not compete with all these materials, I regard it as largely a revenue duty. The wools of the third class are the low-grade wools ordinarily known as carpet wools. I think it is true that some of these wools are used in clothing, but not a large part. Necessarily we have not used a great amount of those wools in times past, because our duty has been so high that they were excluded from our market. But I have put a duty of 5 cents upon wools of the third class, clean, and a maximum of 40 per cent, and I regard that as probably one-half of the duty of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill.

The shrinkage on these wools runs from 30 to 60 per cent, so that a fair average would be probably 40 or 45 per cent, and that applied to my duty upon clean wool will show a reduction as compared with the present law of between 40 and 50 per cent, substantially.

I will not consume the time of the Senate in discussing the wastes of wool manufacture. I will content myself with reading what I have done and will compare the duties which I have put upon these wastes with the Payne-Aldrich law.

In the existing law the duty on top and slubbing waste is 30 cents per pound. I have reduced it to 20.

In the present law the duty on roving, ring, and garnetted waste is 30 cents per pound. I have reduced it to 16 cents a pound.

On noils the present duty is 20 cents a pound. I have reduced it to 14 cents and 11 cents, depending on whether the noils are carbonized or not.

On thread waste and yarn waste the present duty is 20 cents a pound. I have reduced it to 7.

On shoddy the present duty is 25 cents per pound. I have reduced it to 7.

On woolen rags the existing duty is 10 cents, and I have reduced it to 3.

All that I have to say with respect to these duties is that I believe them to be in fair harmony with the remainder of the bill, in which the people of this country are deeply and vitally interested.

The next process in the manufacture of wool is the production, so far as the worsted industry is concerned, of tops. I shall not discuss this phase of the subject, but I do want to state precisely what I have done in my amendment as compared with the present law.

In the existing statue, if the value of tops does not exceed 20 cents a pound, there is a compensatory duty of 24¾ cents per pound and a protective or an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent. I have reduced the duty to 12 cents per pound, with an ad valorem of 5 per cent. If the tops exceed 20 cents per pound, the existing duty is 32⅜ cents per pound. That is compensatory. That is supposed to be a compensation for the manufacturer for the increased price he has been compelled to pay for the wool which has entered into this construction. I have reduced it to 16 cents per pound and 5 per cent ad valorem. So I have proceeded in this particular article from step to step, making the reduction practically as I have stated.

I have taken the conversion cost abroad and at home as given by the Tariff Board, and I find that the 5 per cent is sufficient to compensate for the difference between the cost of conversion here and elsewhere and that the other duties which I have put upon tops abundantly compensate the manufacturer for any increase in the price that he paid for wool as compared with the price abroad.

The next step is the spinning process, and the product is yarn. The existing law puts a duty on woolen yarn, if it does not exceed 30 cents a pound in value, of 27½ cents per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem, and above 30 cents a pound the compensatory duty is 38½ cents and 40 per cent ad valorem.

It is assumed in the present law that the manufacturer of yarn pays for the wool which enters a pound of yarn 27½ cents more, if the value be not more than 30 cents, than his rival abroad. The absurdity of the statement is apparent to anyone who knows anything respecting this subject. On yarn above 30 cents a pound in value the compensating duty of the existing law is 38½ cents per pound, although there is no possibility that the manufacturer has paid under existing law, or could pay, more than 18, 20, or 21 cents above what his rival pays abroad.

I have reduced the duty on these yarns from 27½ to 14, from 38½ to 18, 21, and 24. I have reduced the protective duty from 35 per cent to 12 per cent, from 40 per cent to 15 per cent, and 20 and 25. I have made more divisions in my amendment than there are in the existing law, but have reduced the duties as you see.

I want the Senate to remember when it is examining the Tariff Board report with respect to yarns that in giving the conversion cost in percentages it refers not to the entire value of the article, but only to that part of its value which is embraced in labor and capital, interest, and other things of that kind. The Tariff Board says that in no instance in which it has examined the conversion cost of yarn has the cost been more than 20 per cent of the entire value of the yarn.

While the protective duties which I have added to the compensatory duties for yarns are, on the whole, barely one-half of the duties of the existing law, yet, in my opinion, they are more than adequate. Where I have been in doubt I have given the benefit of that doubt rather to the increase than to the diminution of the duty, because I have hoped that we could gather sufficient strength here to pass a law that would finally receive the approval of the Executive and that would begin at once its beneficial work in relieving the people of this country of some of the unjust burdens which they now bear.

I come now to cloth. I do not intend to enter into all the niceties of this business. You all know that the variety of woolen cloth or cloth that is part wool and part some other fiber is almost infinite. I would consume days and weeks if I were to attempt to review the conclusions of the Tariff Board or the information of the Tariff Board upon all these things, but I sum it all up in this comparison.

As to ordinary woolen cloth or partly wool cloth, under the existing law if the value per pound does not exceed 40 cents the compensatory duty is 33 cents per pound, and the protective or ad valorem duty is 50 per cent. If the value is not over 70 cents per pound, the compensatory duty is 44 cents a pound and the protective duty 50 per cent.

You will remember that clause in the existing statute which says that on such cloth the duty shall first be four times the duty upon 1 pound of unwashed wool. If the cloth or fabric is above the value of 70 cents, the compensatory duty is still 44 cents, and the protective duty 55 per cent.

The absurdity of giving a compensatory duty of 33 cents for a pound of cloth that is not in and of itself worth more than 40 cents must be apparent to every thinking man. The wool in a pound of cloth, if it be all wool that is not valued at more than 40 cents, has not cost the manufacturer more than 24 cents. That is the entire cost of the wool, and yet this compensatory duty is upon the theory that the home manufacturer has paid for the wool which enters that pound of cloth 33 cents more than the producer abroad pays for his wool.

One of the striking injustices of the wool schedule is the supposed compensatory duty, which seems to me to have been levied without right or reason, without any investigation whatsoever of the subject, and without any regard to the truth respecting the matter.

In my amendment I have provided that these compensatory duties shall begin at 16 cents in cloths or fabrics worth not more than 40 cents per pound, and I have made more divisions here as well. I have attempted to give the lower duties to the lower-priced fabrics. I have not been so careful of those who were able to wear the finest and the most expensive cloths as I have of those who have been and are now compelled to wear the lower-priced cloths.

I have begun my protective duties at 30 per cent, and then they rise to 35 and 40 and reach 55 only in the highest priced fabrics. The reduction which I have proposed here, although I have not attempted to parallel it as a whole, is probably a reduction of 40 per cent in the duty upon cloth.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment further. I will then yield to the Senator from Nevada. May I say here, the essential difference, or one of the essential differences, between the amendment I propose and the present law is that the present law levies the compensatory duties upon the entire weight of the fabric. The fabric may be one three-fourths cotton or some other fiber, and yet it is assumed in the law that the producer has been compelled to pay the entire compensatory amount upon the weight of the cloth. In each case my amendment allows a compensatory duty only upon the wool that is contained in the fabric, so that if it is half wool and half cotton, of equal weight, the compensatory duty would be one-half the sum that I have named in these tables. I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would ask the Senator from Iowa what is the average percentage of duties upon wool and woolen goods under his amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not determined it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is the Senator able to state how his amendment would compare with the House bill as to the percentage of duties upon wool and woolen goods?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not attempted to determine it. I have had no opportunity to do it. It is a very difficult task. But I can give an estimate which probably would be a fair one. I think the average of these duties based upon the importations of last year would be 10 to 15 per cent higher than the House bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is the Senator able to state how much below the present tariff the pending House bill is?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think about 35 per cent, although there is no uniformity there. That answer really furnishes very little light upon the subject, because there are some duties in the present tariff that are ridiculously high. There are others that are very near the reasonable point. Therefore there is no way of establishing an exact parallel.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I understand that the bill prepared by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House commanded practically all the Republican votes in the House. I should like to know how the Senator's bill compares in a general way with that measure, if he can state.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are several differences that I must mention before I answer the question generally. In the first place, the bill in the House levies a duty of 18 cents a pound on clean wool without any maximum. I have put in my amendment a maximum of 45 per cent. That makes a very great difference between the two bills. It makes a duty on wool of the low grade much lower in my amendment than in the House bill.

My compensatory duties are lower than the bill to which the Senator from Washington refers. The ad valorem duties are substantially the same. I think the bill prepared by the Republicans of the Ways and Means Committee of the House does not give proper weight to two things. One of them it could not have considered and the other it ought to have considered. The one it could not have considered was that under my amendment the duty upon a great deal of the wool which has come into the United States will not be 18 cents a pound. If the wool is worth but 30 cents the duty would be but 14 cents a pound. If it were worth but 25 cents it would be still less. Therefore the compensatory duties as I have adjusted them are necessarily a little lower than those found in the minority bill of the House. As to the ad valorem, it seems to me the House or the minority of the House did not take sufficient account of the fact that the duty on wool does not increase the price of two-thirds of the amount used by the manufacturers the amount of the duty. The manufacturers buy two-thirds of their wool in America. They do not pay any duty upon it. The wool is undoubtedly enhanced in value by reason of the duty which they pay upon the one-third which they import, but the price is not advanced by the amount of the duty. Therefore I have not considered it necessary to give to the manufacturer in every instance a compensatory duty upon the hypothesis that he had paid upon the wool that he bought and manufactured the full amount of the duty. However, taking it as a whole, there is not a very great difference between the bill which is reported by the minority of the Ways and Means Committee and this amendment.

The next great subject of this schedule embraces blankets and flannels for underwear. The present law levies a duty of 22 cents a pound on a blanket which is not worth more than 40 cents a pound, although it may be very largely composed of some other material. Upon a blanket which is worth 50 cents a pound, and not more, it levies a compensatory duty of 33 cents, and above 50 cents in value it continues to levy 33 cents per pound.

In these three divisions it levies duties of 30 per cent, 35 per cent, and 40 per cent, which are supposed to be the protective part of the performance. In my amendment the compensatory duties are levied only upon the wool that is in the blanket, and then only 18 cents per pound; but if it be worth 50 cents, then 20 cents per pound, and if it be worth above 50, then 23 cents per pound, and the protective duty on the lower priced 20 per cent, on the next grade 25 per cent, and the next grade 30 per cent.

On ready-made clothing the existing law levies a duty on all values, or without regard to value, of 44 cents per pound and 60 per cent ad valorem. In my amendment I begin with ready-made clothing worth not more than 40 cents per pound, and I levy a compensatory duty of 20 cents per pound upon the actual wool in the garment, with an ad valorem of 35 per cent instead of 60. If the cloth is worth 60 cents per pound, then my duty is 22 cents for compensation upon the wool in the garment and 40 per cent ad valorem.

And so I proceed by the same steps that I employ with regard to cloth until I reach the very highest price of ready-made goods of all sorts where the compensatory duty is 28½ cents per pound upon the wool and 55 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. President, I think that I have sufficiently passed over the amendment which I propose to enable it to be understood. I may say, in passing, I have reduced to a degree the lower grades of carpets. I have not reduced the very highest priced rugs and covering of that sort to any considerable amount. I do not care so much for them. One who is able to import and to use one of the high-priced, beautiful, and artistic rugs ought to be willing to pay for it, and can without hardship pay for it, but the coverings of the floors of the poorer people are very materially reduced in my amendment; not, however, below the point of protection, because I believe that if the woolen and the carpet manufacturer in this country gets his material as cheaply as his competitor abroad gets it he will make carpets substantially as cheap as they can be made anywhere in the whole world.

Our production of the cheaper carpets has been one of the marvels of industry in this country, and we do not need and we ought not to maintain these duties, which may have been helpful and necessary long ago, but which are now but an invitation to such combination as will unduly enhance or increase the price of these commodities.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa. Would these cheaper carpets be made of domestic or imported wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mainly of imported wool.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then that wool imported would take the place of domestic wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. We do not raise any carpet wool, or substantially none.

Mr. HEYBURN. We raise some.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very little. The amount of wools that we raise in this country that are fit to be manufactured into carpets or that would be manufactured into carpets is negligible.

Mr. HEYBURN. How much domestic wool is now used in the manufacture of these carpets?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would be I think fairly accurate if I would say none, although I have no doubt there is a little. If you will turn to the Tariff Board report—I do not know that I have the exact——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will not get much comfort out of that Tariff Board report on that question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not pretend to get any comfort from the Tariff Board report. I get information.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not comfortable information.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is very comfortable information. I have my information, too, from a great many people who are interested in the business. These low-priced wools that are found in class 3, not only of my amendment but of the old statute, are the wools used in making carpets.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then what is to be gained by reducing the duty on wool that is imported as carpet wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course I refer only to imported wool. We do not levy any duties on domestic wool. The duties simply have an indirect effect.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why reduce the duty on this wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. I reduce the duty because I want the carpet manufacturers in this country to get their wool in this country as cheaply as possible, inasmuch as it does not interfere with any domestic production.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I were satisfied that it did not interfere with any domestic production, I might then be in a frame of mind to take the question into consideration, but I am not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I have been in that frame of mind; I have taken it into consideration; I have examined with a great deal of care the information given to us by the Tariff Board upon it; I have discussed the matter with many men who have the most comprehensive knowledge of the whole subject; and from all these sources I am led to believe that the wools that are used in the carpets of this country do not substantially enter into competition with our domestic wools.

I know perfectly well that some of the wools in class 3 if imported might enter into clothing; I know that might make some difference in the price of cloth, and I want some difference to be made in the price of cloth. If there is any of this wool that is fit to be used in the manufacture of cloth, out of which a suit of clothes can be made, I want that to come in at such a duty as will not interfere with the home producer but will permit our manufacturer to take the wool and give employment to our own people. We have to import the wool.

If we can import more, we shall make more cloth for the people who need it. There are some of them who have not quite enough; there are many people in this country who have not enough to wear, prosperous as we are. The Senator from Idaho knows well that there is many a man now who needs more clothing, as there was many a man last winter who needed more clothing; and there will be many a man during the coming winter who will feel the need of more clothes than he is able to buy. I want the duty on low-priced cloths to be reduced to the lowest possible point.

Mr. HEYBURN. So that more wool may come in from abroad out of which to manufacture them at the expense of our producer?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I say very frankly, if I have to choose between arresting, in a measure, the progress of some sheep farmer and covering the man who is shivering with the cold upon the streets in this northern country, then I am with the man who is shivering, and I will give him clothes, if I am able to do it, and at a price at which he can buy them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Made of foreign wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. If he can not afford to buy wool which is produced in our own country, then I say foreign wool, of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. And where will he get the money to pay for this foreign wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. He will get the money by pursuing whatever vocation he may have chanced to adopt.

Mr. HEYBURN. Doubtless the Senator has taken into consideration the fact that more than one-half of the wool produced in this country is produced on the farm as distinguished from the range?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes; quite a good bit; more than one-half of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. And that wool, of course, would be reduced in quantity of product to the extent we import?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not agree to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would we manufacture more clothes because of importing the wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. We would.

Mr. HEYBURN. And sell them cheaper?

Mr. CUMMINS. We would.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would we pay as much for domestic wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. We would.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under what rule?

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the ordinary rules of business and commerce.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of supply and demand?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of supply and demand.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, the supply of the wool in this country would not be affected?

Mr. CUMMINS. There never has been a time or an instance in the whole history of business in which the cheapening of the product has not increased its consumption.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but how about its production? I am interested in maintaining the standard of production of wool.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it increases the consumption, it must increase the production.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not unless the consumption is of the home production. If it increases the consumption by importing foreign wool and manufacturing cheaper goods, then you get in conflict with the manufacturer of our own goods out of our own material and at the expense of that class.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, here are certain wools the like of which we do not produce in our country; they are peculiarly fitted, apparently, for the making of carpets. I suppose the cheapness of carpet will to a great extent determine the use of carpets.

Mr. HEYBURN. Was the standard of prosperity as high in the old days as in this period?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, Mr. President, our standard of prosperity was much higher then than I see in some places in these days.

Mr. HEYBURN. Where is this poverty, except in the newspapers and in speeches?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a great deal of poverty in speeches, I agree. [Laughter.] I think if we should measure the prosperity of this country by the riches of our oratory in the last few years, we would indeed be hopeless.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will bear with me a moment further. I heard these arguments prior to the passage of the Wilson bill. I heard many long, tiresome arguments based upon the difference between the fiber of long Australian wool and American wool, and a dozen other technical propositions of that kind, and it was demonstrated to an absolute certainty that free wool would benefit all of the people; that they would have more carpets on their floors and more clothing on their backs. We had free wool and we had no money with which to either buy the carpets or the clothing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, along with those speeches in which the Senator from Idaho heard about the disasters of free wool I have heard a great many such speeches as the Senator from Idaho has just made.

Mr. HEYBURN. And they sent the Republican Party out of power and brought in Democratic times, and we remember it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not advocating free wool; I am not a free trader. I do not believe, however, in levying duties that are unnecessary, but I do believe that there is now, and there always has been, and always will be, a great deal of poverty and suffering and want in this country, and in every other country, and that it is our bounden duty to alleviate it all just so far as we can. The Senator from Idaho seems to believe that there is not at this time a boy or girl or man or woman in this country who, wanting a meal, can not get it.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are fewer now than there will be if certain policies of the Government are adopted, and we have the past to prove it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I think, Mr. President, if the policies of which the Senator from Idaho seems to be the most distinguished and effective advocate continue, we shall see more of the distress and discontent which lead to want than we now have. The Senator from Idaho can not tempt me into a position that I do not want to occupy. I am in favor of every reasonable protection to the carpet manufacturers and to the cloth manufacturers and to the woolgrowers; but the Senator from Idaho differs from me in this: There is no duty that can be too high from his standpoint. There I part company with him. While reasonably protective duties are essential, as I think, for the well-being of the American people, excessive protective duties not only destroy the doctrine itself, but add to the fortunes of men without labor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Add to the fortunes of men without work or labor?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEYBURN. Who are these men? Will the Senator designate them either by class or circumstance?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I can designate them, but he does not want me to designate them by name, does he?

Mr. HEYBURN. By class.

Mr. CUMMINS. By class; that is the easiest thing in the world. I am very glad the Senator from Idaho mentioned that. I showed the other day, to my satisfaction at least, although I made no impression, I am sure, upon the Senator from Idaho, that the manufacturers of iron and steel were taking from the people of the United States at least $100,000,000 a year more than they were fairly entitled to. They were taking it simply because they had the power to take it; they were taking it without labor in the sense of earning it. Those are the people to whom I refer.

Mr. HEYBURN. What class of men to-day are reaping undue rewards from the wool industry or from the manufacture of woolen goods? Are they overrich and overprosperous?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not say they are. There is the opportunity, however, to become both overrich and overprosperous. The same combination—I do not say whether it exists or not, and I am inclined to think that it does not—but the same combination which has been for years in other fields of industry if accomplished in the woolen industry would enable the manufacturers of textiles to take from the people of the United States vastly more than the sum I have mentioned as the unlawful profits of the steel manufacturers of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have had the existing wool duties since 1897. Has great wealth resulted to any class of people because of those duties, or is it merely an apprehension that great wealth will result?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I am not prepared to say. The American Woolen Co. had great ambitions and great possibilities when it was organized. I do not know how soon it will be able to do in the woolen trade what other great combinations have done in other fields of industry; but I do not intend, if my influence can prevent it, to give them the opportunity to reap unlawful profits. Has the Senator from Idaho examined the report of the Tariff Board?

Mr. HEYBURN. Every word of it, over and over again.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. Then, he knows, I assume, that with regard to the subject we are now discussing the woolen manufacturer could put about 35 per cent upon the major part of their products and still prevent importations.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, the woolen manufacturers do not seem to have found that out. They are not unduly prosperous, and it seems to me the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa is in the direction of building a tariff wall against our industries in order that they may, notwithstanding there is no evidence that they intend to do so, grow more prosperous than they are. That is a tariff wall of another kind, on the other side of the field.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not examined the condition of the woolen manufacturers of this country. I do not say that they have successfully combined in order to impose excessive prices upon the people. I do know, however, that it is not wise for us to permit a tariff law to continue which will enable these manufacturers, if they can agree upon prices, to lift their profits to the point of the existing tariff law. I want them to be prosperous; I want them to earn and divide fair profits; but I do not intend to leave open for them to enter a gate that has been so successfully entered in many other fields.

Mr. HEYBURN. What evidence is there that they would enter it? They have had many years in which to experiment with it, and is there any evidence upon which to base an apprehension that they would enter a gate that admittedly has been open since 1897, and which they have not sought to enter?

Mr. CUMMINS. Ah, Mr. President, I count a good deal upon the ordinary motives of humanity.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the standard of morals fallen among the manufacturers?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the Senator from Idaho ought to press that point.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I think it is a fair inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the merits of a tariff law depend upon my opinion as to the standard of morals among the manufacturers.

Mr. HEYBURN. But they do depend upon the operations of the law, do they not?

Mr. CUMMINS. The whole case rests upon the sufficiency of the duties. The Senator from Idaho would find no difficulty in sustaining a duty of $100 a pound on everything that comes in. He would think that served the public welfare. I do not; that is not my theory of government; it is not my theory of the function which Congress ought to perform with respect to the manufacturers. I am willing, I am anxious, to give them all that protection which will enable them to go on and do their business fairly and enter our markets and sell their products at a reasonable profit. I am not willing, however, to give them the chance to sell their products at a higher price than will fairly remunerate them for their capital and their labor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not equally important that they should be in a position to continue to purchase the products of our own people at fair prices to those who produce the raw materials?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. But if you lessen their profit, will it not result in lessening the price paid to the producers of the raw material?

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, Mr. President, I think that it will stimulate business. I think that if all the people who are brought within the scope of the tariff were compelled to struggle more than they do, if they were compelled to seek all the advantages which genius and enterprise and diligence and energy can suggest, we would be still more prosperous, and I think production would be increased, and, of course, consumption increased accordingly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator does not certainly intend to support a condition that would make the struggle for existence harder or more strenuous than it is now?

Mr. CUMMINS. In business I would.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator thinks people should work harder?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am a believer in competition in this world. I have no sympathy with the views of the Senator from Idaho. I believe that we are better off if we have to fight for what we get. I believe that there is no other road toward the development of humanity. I do not believe that any prize is worth having unless it is reached at the end of a struggle. I am not a Socialist, and I suppose the Senator from Idaho is not either, although his doctrine——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have never been charged with being a Socialist.

Mr. CUMMINS. Although his doctrines would very strongly tend in that direction. I want a fair field and no favor; I want a full opportunity, not to take what belongs to somebody else, but to take what belongs to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. Opportunity to whom—to the producer and the grower of wool?

Mr. CUMMINS. Opportunity to everybody.

Mr. HEYBURN. The subject of the wool industry is not one of degree. When the condition arrives where men can not any longer maintain the production of wool and maintain their flocks they disappear in a minute; it is not a long drawn out process. The flocks are either converted into the first possible market or else the producer becomes bankrupt.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator does not mean that they disappear in a minute. Even the prophet had to take a little while in his translation.

Mr. HEYBURN. When I say a minute, I mean that the condition when a man has no market for his product at home may come in a minute. He may have been able an hour ago to sell his wool for 18 or 19 cents, as it is quoted to-day in our markets, and to-morrow he may not be able to sell it at all, or in an hour he may not be able to sell it at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no disposition to lessen the opportunity of the woolgrower; on the contrary, I have in this amendment a duty upon wool which, as I understand, is regarded even by the woolgrower as abundant and adequate. The Senator from Idaho was not here when I discussed that part of my measure.

Now, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will pardon me for having stood here so long in colloquy with the Senator from Idaho. It is impossible to resist him when he approaches one in so kindly a way, and therefore I felt that I ought to answer the questions which he has put to me. I am conscious that this subject is one which can not be explored or exhausted in a day and therefore I have attempted simply to state the comparison between the amendment which I have offered and the existing law. I close by saying——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the Senator closes I should like to ask him a question, if he will permit me to interrupt him at this point.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Of course the Senator realizes that the ultimate end to be accomplished by the imposition of tariff duties with a view to protection is to stimulate domestic production to such an etxent that, if possible, it may supply all domestic demands. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it is always limited to a case in which there is an immediate expectation of being able to supply the entire domestic demand.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstands me. I did not mean that; I meant that would be considered as the highest consummation of the protective-tariff policy.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. BACON. The Senator contemplates the possibility that by stimulating domestic production of raw wool the time may come when the production will equal the consumption in this country. Is not that correct?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt that is the hope of a great many people.

Mr. BACON. The question I want to ask the Senator is this: If domestic production can be so stimulated that it will equal domestic consumption, what will be the result on the price? Will not your tariff at once cease to have any effect on it, and will not the price of the wool be the price as fixed in the world's market, just as it is in the case of cotton. Suppose—I will put it a little stronger—that we should produce a surplus of wool, more than we consume, would not immediately the price of wool be fixed by the world's price of wool, just as it is in the case of cotton, and would not at once your protective duty cease to have any effect on the price of wool in the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree if we produce a large surplus of wool——

Mr. BACON. Not necessarily a large surplus; any surplus.

Mr. CUMMINS. That it would bear the same general relations to the commerce of the country as does cotton; but I think the Senator from Georgia will remember that I had a little discussion with him upon this same point some months ago. I do not think there is any such thing as a world's market. I do not share the opinion which so many people seem to hold that the price is fixed in London or at Liverpool or at Antwerp or anywhere else.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator were a grower of cotton, he would change his mind on that subject very promptly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I do not think so; because it is the condition throughout the whole world that determines the price in London. London does not determine the price in and of itself.

Mr. BACON. Of course not.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the amount that we consume and the amount that we produce have just as much effect upon the price anywhere throughout the world as the amount which is produced in other countries that export their product to England.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. While all these general influences, of course, affect the price there are certain centers of trade as to various articles, in which centers prices are given out to the world because they are the centers. For instance, take the matter of sealskins. The prices are absolutely fixed in London, because that is the center of that industry; and the same thing is true of cotton. The center of the cotton industry is Liverpool, and consequently the quotation of Liverpool is accepted the world over as the price, not because Liverpool fixes it, for, after all, the various agencies and influences of which the Senator speaks of course have their controlling influence in the fixing of the price; but there is where it finds its expression, there is the point at which it is given out, and it is the utterance found there, it is the expression given out there, which is accepted by the whole world as the standard of price.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that may be so at a given time of cotton, but it is not true of a great many other products. We had a discussion here a year or so ago about wheat. We export wheat, but I have never believed that Liverpool fixes the price of wheat any more than Chicago fixes the price of wheat. Although we are an exporting country, we consume a very large part of our wheat production. We therefore pay, partly guided by the Liverpool price and partly guided by our own desires and necessities, for the commodity. However, the difference between the Senator from Georgia and myself, I am sure, is purely academic, purely abstract.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to call the Senator's attention to and get his view upon the proposition that if this could become a great woolgrowing country, one which would not only supply its own demands, but in addition to that have a surplus which would in a measure supply the demands of other countries, the wool industry would at once cease to be an infant industry which could not stand alone and would have to stand in competition with the prices of the world without having an artificial price fixed by a tariff.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree that whenever we reach the point where we must meet with any considerable part of our product the wool of other countries in London and Liverpool and in all the other centers of trade, then, of course, we can not maintain here a price that is higher than that which obtains abroad—I mean considerably higher and over a long period of time.

Mr. BACON. And therefore the legitimate conclusion of those who contend for a protective tariff upon wool is that it would be to the interest of the woolgrower to restrict production below the amount of consumption.

Mr. CUMMINS. Whatever might be his interest, carefully analyzed, it is quite sure there can be no concert of action among the woolgrowers, as they are scattered all over the farms from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and therefore raising that number of sheep which the farmer believes will for the time best meet his own purposes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I notice that the bill as it came to us from the House places sheep and goats in the same class and places them at the same rate of duty, while the Senator from Iowa in his proposed amendment places wool in a different class from the hair of the camel, the goat, and other animals, with a different rate of duty.

I should like to ask the Senator why he makes a distinction between them, because, as I understand, the amount of imported mohair is in about the same proportion as the amount of imported wool, and it seems to me, if the purpose of the Senator is to protect the sheep industry, he ought to be willing to extend the same protection to the other industry, and that is the raising of Angora goats.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the House bill there is no occasion for making any classification, because it is an ad valorem bill, and therefore there is no need to classify. When we employ specific duties, however, it is thought best not to embrace any wider range of value than necessary, and that is the reason I separated the classes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Senator if he does not think, as a matter of fact, that the Angora goat industry in this country, which is a rapidly growing one, as shown by the report of the Tariff Board, should have the same protection, if any protection is conceded to be necessary, as is extended to the other industry?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; the same measure of protection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It seems to me——

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think I have the duty too low?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know but that it is, in comparison with the duty placed on wool. I do not see why there should be any difference between the two. I am frank to say to the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is, the Senator does not see any reason why, if the duty on class 1 wool is 18 cents per pound, the duty on hair of class 2 should not also be 18 cents a pound?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it ought to be placed in exactly the same category.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why does the Senator think so? Is the shrinkage the same?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am frank to say to the Senator that I am not familiar with the industry, nor as to the amount of shrinkage, but I understand it is practically the same. The position I am taking in reference to the matter is that the Angora goat and the sheep in this country, and the products from both, are practically in the same category.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assumed that 8 cents a pound was as protective for the hair of the Angora goat as 18 cents a pound was for the wool, under the Tariff Board report. If I have made an error about that, and the Senator from Oregon will point it out, and will offer an amendment increasing it from 8 cents to whatever it should be, I will be very glad to accept it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As I stated to the Senator, I do not know what the shrinkage of either is. I have not made this bill a study, but it seems to me from reading the report of the Tariff Board that they should be placed in the same category.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seemed to me otherwise, and I thought I had adjusted them according to the facts in each case. But I am always open to conviction, and if the Senator from Oregon or any other Senator will show me that the duty ought to be increased on the hair in class 2, I will be very glad to yield to proof, as I want full and complete protection for all these products and no more.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I, of course, assume that the Senator from Iowa has taken into consideration the effect of any reduction in or the destruction of the growing of wool in this country upon the price of land, upon the employment of labor. There is about $4,000,000 in labor connected with the raising of sheep alone; something over $2,000,000 in the herding States and about the same amount in the farming States, according to the report of the Tariff Board, which I have before me.

If you reduce it 25 per cent, you have put out of business 500,000 people. You have reduced the price of the land now devoted to the raising of sheep, because the man with the land must find some other use for it if the sheep business is unprofitable. If it is practically destroyed, as it was under free wool, then you must find some other use for the land devoted to sheep raising; you must find some other employment for all the people engaged in the sheep industry, and they are projected into other channels of labor and investment at the expense of those already engaged in those fields.

This is not just a question of the price of carpet or of the price of a coat. It is a question of maintaining a large industry that is attached to the soil, and the labor of the country. It is a question whether you will put them out of business to the extent of 1 per cent or 5 per cent or 50 per cent, or altogether. The injury, of course, may be complete or it may be partial. Would the Senator advocate any system of legislation or of administration of the law that would decrease the opportunity to use profitably the land upon which this industry is now based or the labor connected with it? Would he advocate a governmental policy that would decrease it at all?

You talk about the poverty of the people who can not buy coats or have carpets on their floors. They are of small consequence as compared with those who are actually engaged in this enterprise. Every pound of wool that is imported into this country from abroad is at the expense, to that extent, of those who are engaged in producing wool in this country.

Are we going to legislate to diminish the prosperity of our people at all? It is just as much of a crime to reduce it 10 per cent as it is to reduce it 20 per cent, because you are taking away from an American citizen, from an American industry, an opportunity to the extent of the per cent of the reduction. It not merely changes or affects the price of a carpet or a coat, but it affects a great industry of the people, and the prosperity of the American people depends upon opportunity to engage in profitable industrial enterprises, whether it be the owning of the land, which is the result of labor, or the accumulation of money resulting from labor; or whether it be the occupation of the sheep herder or of the merchant who finds his market for every imaginable character of commodities with these people. When you diminish their prosperity you diminish their purchasing power. You withdraw to that extent from the great aggregate prosperity of all the people. When these people are engaged in raising sheep or producing wool they can not be engaged in other enterprises at the same time. You put them out of business, and they become consumers and not producers, and they become consumers without revenue.

Now, Mr. President, that is the real question to be considered, Shall we diminish any single field of opportunity or enterprise to any extent, large or small? That is not the legitimate purpose of government. It is an illegitimate exercise of power to take away from any man any part of his opportunity, great or small, and the injury to a small extent may be the difference between profit and loss. It may mean, and it does mean in this enterprise, the difference between remaining in business and going out of business; going out of it not to some assured substitute, but going out of it with no assurance that any substitute can be found for the prosperity represented by the enterprise.

It is for that reason that I speak so earnestly with regard to this industry. It is not tolerable that we should consider on how little prosperity the American people can get along. It is not tolerable to consider how strenuous we can make the effort incident to maintaining individual life and happiness. The effort and purpose of government should be to see how easy we can make it for people to earn a livelihood; how large a margin we can give them, beyond the necessity of the endeavor to earn a livelihood, to secure what we may term the graces and the luxuries of life. Man was not created merely to labor as many hours as his physical frame would endure. He was not created for the purpose of seeing how little he could get along with in the way of luxuries or necessities. Government was instituted for the purpose of lessening or reducing the burdens of individual life to the minimum, not for the purpose of seeing how close he can shade to the line of necessity in order that he may merely exist.

It affects the price of the land, it affects the prosperity of the individual, who depends upon the price of the land and its possibilities of production. Therefore I am opposed to any legislation that has to be bolstered up by an argument that the people could endure it. This is not the proper rule by which to measure the rights of the people in legislation.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire, in the first instance, to say a few words about the substitute amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I understand that that amendment is now pending and that it will probably be the first question to be voted on to-day.

This substitute was proposed only yesterday and was printed for the first time this morning. No Senator as far as I know has had any opportunity to examine this substitute until to-day. It does not seem to me that that is quite a fair way to deal with those of us who are advocating the passage of the bill as it came from the House. In all fairness the Senator from Iowa should have proposed his amendment at an earlier day, so that it might have been examined, analyzed, compared with the existing law and with the pending bill; that it might be better understood by Senators when they come to vote on it. Just why its presentation was withheld until an hour so late I can only conjecture. I do not feel disposed, out of courtesy and because of the proprieties, to venture an opinion. I never saw the proposition, although a member of the Finance Committee, until it appeared in the RECORD this morning.

After seeing it I conferred at once with one of the experts employed by the minority of the Finance Committee to aid them during the consideration of tariff measures, and asked him if he could examine this substitute, analyze it, and make the necessary comparisons in time for to-day. He said he did not consider that to be possible, if the result of his work was to be reliable.

Sitting here at my desk since the Senate met at noon I have undertaken to make some comparisons of this substitute with the House bill and with the bill passed by the Senate and House during the extra session last summer, and which was vetoed by the President. Manifestly, it is impossible to make anything like a satisfactory comparison within such brief time and under such circumstances. But I find this much to be true: That while the pending bill was under consideration in the House of Representatives a substitute for it was offered there. That substitute had been previously proposed by a Member of the House—Mr. PAYNE, of New York, formerly chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and now the senior member of the minority of that committee.

I find that the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa, although differing in some particulars, is framed upon the line of the Payne bill which was offered as a substitute to the House bill while the bill was pending there. The Payne substitute offered in the House and the Cummins substitute now offered in the Senate are substantially the same, differing, as I have said, only in some details. The Payne substitute was defeated in the House by a large majority. I have hurriedly compared the measure proposed by the Senator from Iowa with the bill passed at the extraordinary session last year and which the President vetoed. I find that this substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa proposes rates very much higher than the rates carried in the bill passed last year.

Mr. President, it might be well to briefly recall the history of the bill of last year, showing how it was passed. Early in the session of 1911 the House of Representatives passed a bill reducing the rates on wool and woolen manufactures. That bill, when it reached the Senate, was referred to the Finance Committee, and subsequently was reported adversely by that committee. The bill was debated here at considerable length, and finally it was defeated by the majority—that is, by the votes of Republican Senators. After it was voted down the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill had been defeated. The Democrats voted for that motion, as did a number of so-called insurgents, or Progressive Republican Senators, and the motion to reconsider prevailed. Thereupon the Senator from Wisconsin offered a substitute for the House bill. That substitute proposed rates of duty somewhat higher than those in the House bill, but the Democrats of the Senate, not being able to pass the House bill, joined with Progressive Republicans and voted for the LA FOLLETTE substitute, and passed it. The bill thus amended was returned to the House; the House disagreed to the amendment, and a conference was had. Out of that conference a bill was evolved which was finally agreed to, as I have said, by both Houses, was sent to the President, and by him vetoed.

I have attempted hastily to compare the rates set forth in the Cummins substitute, now pending, with the rates carried in the bill passed at the last session, and I discover that the rates intended and proposed in this substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa are much higher than those contained in the bill passed by the two Houses last year. In addition to that the Cummins substitute differs in another important particular from the LA FOLLETTE substitute of last year. In the bill of last year the rates were predicated on an ad valorem basis, just as the House rates then and now were and are predicated on the ad valorem basis. The Senator from Iowa, in the amendment he has offered, fixes the rates for the most part on a specific basis; that is to say, the rates are made specific instead of ad valorem. The Senator from Iowa, at the extraordinary session last year, supported and voted for the LA FOLLETTE substitute. He then thought as Senator LA FOLLETTE thought, as the House thought, and as the Democratic Senators in this Chamber thought, that ad valorem duties were in every way better than specific or compound duties. He seems now to have changed his opinion as to this. He has abandoned the plan or policy of ad valorem duties and now advocates specific duties. The measure passed last year and the one now offered by the Senator from Iowa differ in the very bases upon which they are built, as well as in their framework.

I do not know what has caused this radical change of base by the distinguished Senator. A year ago he stood here earnestly supporting a measure resting exclusively on an ad valorem basis. Now he proposes a measure resting almost exclusively on a specific basis. The two measures are fundamentally different in the lines upon which they were constructed. The Senator's change of base is therefore itself fundamental. The substitute now proposed by the Senator from Iowa is essentially a protective measure. I can not help wondering whether, while preparing it, he was in consultation with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], or some other Senator of extreme protection views. If the Senator from Utah had offered this substitute, I would not have been surprised, but I am astonished that it comes from the Senator from Iowa, so recently a stalwart advocate of ad valorem duties and for such a downward revision of the tariff as would have some real significance.

Possibly the Senator from Utah, or some of his colleagues who adhere to his extreme tariff views, may even yet offer another substitute. I do not know. It may be that they are satisfied with the one offered by the Senator from Iowa. But if not satisfied, it may be that later on in the twilight of the day the graceful form of the Senator from Utah may tower in the Senate, and we may hear his strident voice sounding a note of war even braver than that of the Senator from Iowa—a sort of last-ditch declaration. Before it is all over, and especially if the proposal of the Senator from Iowa fails, I shall expect the Senator from Utah to propose a substitute for the House bill even more impossible than that proposed by the Senator from Iowa. I do not know what it will be, but I am prepared in advance to say that I am sure I would as soon vote for it as to vote for the substitute the Senator from Iowa has offered. I am not a protectionist, and I am not willing to vote for any measure distinctively framed for the avowed purpose of protection. I want the substance of a revision downward and not merely the shadow.

I observe that the Senator from Iowa, having delivered himself of his substitute and his speech, has disappeared from the Senate—disappeared and left his baby on our steps. Nevertheless, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a few items in this pending substitute and compare them with what is known as the La Follette substitute to the House bill passed at the first session of this Congress, and also to compare them with the substitute offered to the pending bill in the House of Representatives which was prepared by Representative PAYNE and the Republican minority of the Ways and Means Committee.

I can not at this late hour occupy unduly the time of the Senate by attempting to go through many of these items. I can only refer to some of them as examples.

In the Cummins substitute, for example, top waste and slubbing waste are put down at 20 cents per pound; roving waste, ring waste, garnetted waste, 16 cents per pound.

In the substitute offered to the bill in the House, known as the Payne substitute, top waste and slubbing waste, set down in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa at 20 cents a pound, are set down in the House substitute at 18 cents a pound. Roving waste, ring waste, and garnetted waste are set down by the Senator from Iowa in his proposition at 16 cents a pound; in the House substitute, at 14 cents a pound.

The Senator from Iowa appears to have even a more tender regard for wastes than Representative PAYNE, and would extend a broader hand of protection over them. He would do more for wastes than the Hon. SERENO PAYNE, author of the Payne-Aldrich law, would do for them. He would out-Herod Herod.

Now, taking what I will designate as the La Follette amendment to the wool bill agreed to at the extra session of last year and which was finally adopted by both Houses, top waste and slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, and garnetted waste were all taxed, or proposed to be taxed, at the same rate—that is, at 30 per cent ad valorem. But the Senator from Iowa now proposes a much higher rate than that. Why? He voted for the La Follette substitute last year, and it had the benefit of his able support in every way.

Again, take combed wool or tops made wholly or in part of wool or camel's hair valued at not more than 20 cents per pound, the tax proposed by the Senator from Iowa is 12 cents per pound on the wool therein, and in addition thereto 5 per cent ad valorem.

Under the 1911 La Follette substitute the same material was taxed 40 per cent ad valorem. You can see at once that the rate proposed by the Senator from Iowa is very much higher. And so on down the line in that section.

On yarns made wholly or in part of wool valued at not more than 30 cents per pound the duty proposed in the pending Cummins amendment is 14 cents per pound on the wool contained therein and in addition thereto 12 per cent ad valorem.

In the La Follette substitute of 1911, which the Senator from Iowa supported, this same material was taxed 45 per cent ad valorem. Under the Cummins amendment it would amount to over 58 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri may, of course, criticize me in any way he desires; I am entirely indifferent about that.

Mr. STONE. I am now criticizing the Senator's bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. But he has forgotten apparently to note that yarn that is not worth more than 20 cents per pound or 30 cents per pound is not all composed of wool; it can not be all composed of wool; it must be largely composed of something else; and the duty of 12 cents a pound, as he has read it there, or 14 or 16 cents, as the case may be, is upon the wool only in the yarn. Therefore the conclusions which he is just reaching are wholly baseless.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if you go on through the section the same rates substantially obtain. Let us see:

On blankets and on flannels for underwear, composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty shall be 18 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 20 per cent ad valorem.

That is the Cummins proposal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator say that that is incorrect?

Mr. CUMMINS. The same thing is true of blankets. A blanket that is not worth more than 40 cents a pound is not made of wool.

Mr. STONE. I know it is not made wholly of wool.

Mr. CUMMINS. In common blankets, about which we hear so much, a large part of the material is not wool, and the duty which would be assessed under my amendment on such blankets per pound is a duty upon the wool only. Suppose only one-fourth of the blanket was of wool, what, then, does the Senator from Missouri think would be the comparative duty named in the amendment I have offered and the bill of last year?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, let me read the exact language of the La Follette bill and the Cummins bill, if I may term them so for the purpose of distinguishing them. In paragraph 373 of the so-called La Follette bill I find this language:

On cloths, knit fabrics, blankets, and flannels for underwear—

Blankets and flannels for underwear—

composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, 55 per cent ad valorem.

In the Cummins amendment I find this language:

On blankets and on flannels for underwear, composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty shall be 18 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. President, the amount of wool or the amount of cotton contained in a given article is a matter that we ought to have fully investigated so as not to act blindly, but so as to have some intelligent idea as to what the duty would really be when reduced to its final analysis. We ought to have time to investigate and find out how much wool there is in a blanket worth only 40 cents a pound, and we ought to find out whether a provision like this proposed by the Senator from Iowa is susceptible of a practical administration. That has been strenuously denied by Senators on this floor. Hence, I say that the Senator from Iowa has not treated his colleagues on this side of the Chamber quite fairly in presenting at this late hour, when it is impossible to have it thoroughly examined and understood, this highly important measure, containing such radical changes in the law as would involve even the practicability of administering it and which prescribes rates so much in excess of the rates prescribed in the bill he supported only one year ago. So far as I am concerned, I can not vote for this substitute at any stage of these proceedings.

Mr. President, I do not desire to consume the time of the Senate with a protracted address. The hour is late; and as there are others who desire to be heard I do not think it would be fair or courteous, under the circumstances, to hold the floor for any considerable length of time, and hence I feel constrained to close what I have to say on this occasion after a few brief general observations.

Mr. President, this Congress is engaged in the important work of revising the tariff under promises made by both political parties and in accordance with the expectation of the people throughout the country that tariff taxation would be reduced. Both parties promised the people to reduce the burden of tariff taxation. On September 25, 1908, during the presidential campaign of that year, President Taft, in a speech at Des Moines, said:

"It is my judgment that a revision of the tariff in accordance with the pledge of the Republican Party"—mark the words, "in accordance with the pledge of the Republican Party," and let those words be distinctly remembered—"will be, on the whole, a substantial revision downward."

During the same campaign Candidate Taft, the leader of his party, is reported to have declared in a speech at Winona, Minn., that the rates prescribed in the wool and woolen schedule, Schedule K, were so high as to be indefensible. These were the utterances of the chosen leader of a then united Republican Party, and those utterances stood unchallenged to the day of the election. After the President had been elected and inaugurated he took speedy occasion to assemble the Congress in extraordinary session in the spring of 1909, and out of that Congress came what is known as the Payne-Aldrich law. But the Republican Party did not keep faith with the people. A law was passed, but instead of reducing duties, it substantially increased them. The pledge of the President and of his party was not only not kept, but was ignored. As a result of this bad faith there was a widespread popular resentment. At the election of the following year—November, 1910—the electorate of the country expressed that resentment in emphatic form. A Democratic House was elected, and the Democratic representation in the Senate largely increased.

Soon after that election, in the early spring of 1911, the President again called the Congress together in extra session. At that time the Democratic House of Representatives, responding to the public demand and keeping faith with the people, passed a bill almost identical with the one now pending, revising the woolen schedule, and sent it to the Senate. The Republican minority in the House of Representatives opposed the passage of the bill by that body, and set themselves against the effort of the Democrats over there to reduce the burden of taxation. When the bill came up in the Senate Republican Senators of all descriptions, regulars and insurgents alike, united to defeat the passage of the bill. The Democrats of the Senate were forced to accept a compromise measure proposed by a small minority of Republican Senators known as "insurgents" or "progressives," and the House was later forced to accept that compromise with some amendments or do nothing. The compromise bill was passed and sent to the President. He vetoed it on the ground that his Tariff Board—I say "his Tariff Board" because its members were appointed by him and are under his control—had not reported on certain investigations he said the board was making into the wool and woolen industry.

He vetoed even this Progressive Republican measure on the ground that Congress should not act but should stand by and wait until this little Tariff Board could be heard from. Why, Mr. President, this board was two years in making this one investigation and preparing this one report. If they should expend anything approximating a like time on all the other schedules, and we should wait for their reports before acting, we would not be able to revise the tariff laws during the lifetime of most of the Members of this body. It would require a halt of 15 or 20 years, possibly more, before we could get reports on all the various schedules. And of what particular value would they be after we got them? Is it expected that Congress should follow the board's reports? I do not think so. The report made by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee when this bill was reported to the House shows that the House placed little or no reliance on the report of the Tariff Board. In fact the committee report undertook to show, and I think did show, most conclusively that the report of the Tariff Board on wool and woolens is fragmentary, unreliable, and made on unscientific principles. The House turned it down. Does the President expect to follow the board and stand by what it says? He vetoed the wool bill of last year because the board had not reported on the wool schedule. Will he now veto another bill because Congress refuses to follow the recommendations of the board and refuses to frame a bill in accordance with the data and deductions therefrom furnished by the board? That would be the logic of his position; but that would be to substitute the judgment of this board of five men of his own appointment for the judgment of Congress. The President vetoed a bill reducing tariff duties which as a candidate for office he denounced as indefensible, and vetoed it on the flimsy ground that he was waiting to hear from his Tariff Board. And so, Mr. President, the effort of the Democrats at the extra session of 1911 to revise the tariff downward was defeated by Republican opposition in Congress and by the veto of a Republican President.

After that, in due course, the present session of Congress began in December. What has happened at this session? The steel bill, so called, was brought before the House early in the session, proposing material reductions on metals and metal manufactures. Republican Representatives stubbornly resisted these reductions, but the bill passed the House nevertheless and came to the Senate. The Republican majority of the Senate Finance Committee reported the bill adversely, and when it was taken up for consideration in the Senate the Republicans of the Senate sought to kill the bill by adding to it a provision amending a law passed in 1911 authorizing the free importation from Canada of wood pulp and print paper, and so amending it as to take those articles from the free list and subject them to a heavy tariff duty. In other words, our Republican friends refused to accord the people any relief from the oppressions of the Steel Trust unless the Democrats would agree to oppress the people in the interest of the Paper Trust. And so this amendment, in no wise germane to the steel bill, was added to the bill to embarrass, if not to prevent, the passage of the measure.

Mr. President, I ask myself sometimes—and I ask now—whether Republicans can keep faith with the people or whether they are so tied up that they are bound to serve the great industrial combinations and monopolies of the country? We have seen what has been done with the bill to reduce the duties on steel and iron and other metal products, and now we have the wool bill before us again. Since the veto of the first wool bill the Tariff Board have reported. They reported last December. What, then, is in the way of proceeding with this legislation now? The President and Republican Senators said they were only waiting for this report. I want to read a few lines from the message of the President when he transmitted this report to Congress. The President said:

> In my message of August 17, 1911, accompanying the veto of the wool bill, I said that, in my judgment, Schedule K should be revised and the rates reduced. My veto was based on the ground that, since the Tariff Board would make, in December, a detailed report on wool and wool manufactures, with special reference to the relation of the existing rates of duties to relative costs here and abroad, public policy and a fair regard to the interests of the producers and the manufacturers on the one hand and of the consumers on the other demanded that legislation should not be hastily enacted in the absence of such information; that I was not myself possessed at that time of adequate knowledge of the facts to determine whether or not the proposed act was in accord with my pledge to support a fair and reasonable protective policy; that such legislation might prove only temporary and inflict upon a great industry the evils of continued uncertainty.
> I now herewith submit a report of the Tariff Board on Schedule K. The board is unanimous in its findings. On the basis of these findings I now recommend that the Congress proceed to a consideration of this schedule with a view to its revision and a general reduction of its rates.

That is in line with what the President said in his speech when he was a candidate in 1908. Is he any more in earnest now than he was then? Before we had a Tariff Board he thought the rates in this schedule ought to be reduced; after we got the board the thought there should be no revision until the board had investigated and reported; and now, since the report has been furnished, he again recommends a general reduction of exising rates in the woolen schedule. Will he change front again?

Mr. President, the Democrats of the House promptly responded to this recommendation in the President's message by passing the pending bill. What are our friends on the other side of this Chamber doing? What have they done? They are engaged in a policy of delay, procrastination, opposition. They have not offered, as a party, any substitute for the House bill, or any measure of relief whatever. As the Senator from North Carolina remarked this morning, the majority of the Finance Committee contented themselves with simply voting to report this bill adversely. They do not propose any measure of their own. They are satisfied merely to obstruct, thwart, and baffle the Democrats in Congress in their efforts to fulfill their pledge to the people. Republicans are satisfied to leave things as they are.

Mr. President, both political parties are pledged, as we know, to a substantial downward revision of the tariff, and particularly the tariff on wool and woolen manufactures. I have read already quotations from public utterances and official communications of the President. I wish now to read a few lines from the recent national platforms of the Democratic and Republican parties. The Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore contains this declaration:

> We favor the immediate downward revision of the existing high and, in many cases, prohibitive tariff duties, insisting that material reduction be speedily made on the necessaries of life.

The Republican platform adopted at Chicago contains this declaration:

> We hold that the import duties should be high enough, while yielding a sufficient revenue, to protect adequately American industries and wages. Some of the existing import duties are too high and should be reduced. A readjustment should be made from time to time to conform to changing conditions and to reduce excessive rates, but without injury to any American industry.

"Some of the existing import duties are too high and should be reduced." What duties, if not these duties on wool and woolen manufactures? Of all the schedules, this one is under the ban of universal condemnation. Yet our friends on the other side are not lifting a hand, as the representatives of their party, to keep faith and redeem their pledge. No wonder, after these repeated deceptions and multiplied instances of broken pledges, the country has lost confidence in the sincerity, capacity, and good faith of the Republican Party.

Mr. President, it is difficult to understand the madness that seems to possess Republicans in the Senate and in the House. It may, indeed, be true that—

> Whom the gods destroy they first make mad.

But sure it is that the people, wearied of bearing unnecessary burdens and aroused by the abnormal and unnatural increase in the cost of living, due in large measure to the exactions of tariff-fostered monopolies, are determined to secure some measure of relief—aye, to secure some protection for themselves.

Mr. President, this wool schedule was so exhaustively discussed in 1909 during the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich law, and again in 1911 when the Underwood bill was before Congress, and still again during the present session when the pending bill was being considered by the House, that it seems to me that to go into any extended discussion of this measure in detail would be of necessity, in large part at least, but a repetition of the deliverances made by many Senators and Representatives during the periods to which I have referred.

So, Mr. President, having already detained the Senate longer than I intended, I yield the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, just a word in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] in his plea for a reduction of the high cost of living. Can you conceive of reducing the cost of living by cutting off the meat supply of the country fully one-third? When you strike at the wool industry you strike at the sheep industry from which the wool is produced. If you discourage that industry or strike it down, it will inevitably result in a reduction of the sheep in the country, and correspondingly a reduction of the meat supply.

Perhaps the meat of the sheep is more important to the people on behalf of whom this plea is made than of any other class of meat. What effect would it have on the price of beef and pork if you were to withdraw from the production of meat 33⅓ per cent? That is the relation which the sheep bear to the entire meat production. Would it not necessarily result in an increase in the price of other meats? The addition to the cost of living would be many times the sum that it is claimed by any of those favoring this tariff provision and any possible saving that might be made in the cost of clothing or carpets.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Where do we find a substitute in the meat market?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was only going to say that we were told a little while ago by that high authority on wool, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that the sheep which produce the meat produce practically little or no wool and, vice versa, the sheep that produce the wool produce practically little or no carcass or meat.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I only want to know which is the authority on wool and the meat question.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from New Jersey must have misunderstood the Senator from Utah. No one knowing the facts would make a statement of that kind.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not ask the Senator to take myself as authority. I have never been a sheep grower or raiser, notwithstanding I have seen our sheep, and many of them. But the Senator from Utah, I take it, is the high priest on that question.

Mr. HEYBURN. All the sheep that produce wool eventually go into the meat market and constitute a part of the meat supply of the country. The sheep are not allowed to die after producing wool and pass on to waste; they go to the meat market. When you reduce the sheep supply you reduce or cut off the supply of lambs also, and the Senator from New Jersey would be confronted with the proposition of denying himself the pleasure and benefit of eating the meat of the lambs.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I only want to say, if the Senator will permit me, that my information is not based altogether on my own experience, but I was taking the Senator from Utah as authority, and if he is not qualified I have only to refer to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who stated only a little while ago, in the course of his remarks, that the tariff really had not done much for the sheep industry anyhow; that they really did not get anything but a mere pittance of the protection that came anyway; that there were no real, tangible results to the sheep or the sheep raiser.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have only to refer to the experience of those who lived and thought during the time when we had Democratic free wool. The sheep disappeared practically from the range. The business was no longer profitable. I saw thousands of head of sheep being driven away from home in order that they might not consume the grass, because the market for the sheep and the meat of the sheep had been destroyed when they destroyed the market for the product of the sheep.

I merely at this time arise simply to point out the effect of the destruction of the sheep industry upon the meat supply of the country and ask you to take it into consideration when you are considering this mythical proposition of the high cost of living. I admit that a Democratic tariff would reduce the cost of living. It would bring poverty and the inability of the people to buy and pay for the things that are produced or could be produced, and you will have all the cheap times that you want.

I notice that some one in anticipation of it is proposing to coin 3-cent pieces and half cents, in order that they may be in a position to purchase in this starved market. You will need something less than a half cent, because there will be many people to whom a half cent will be a matter of consequence. I suggest that you carry the idea of reforming the coinage further, and introduce for use during Democratic times coin such as we have seen coming here from the Orient with a square hole in it, made out of a metal without value, in order that you may string enough of them about your neck when you go to market to buy a small basketful of produce.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am glad, Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho realizes and appreciates that a Democratic administration is coming. His foresight is good. But I only want to say that the proposition of a 3-cent piece that he suggested is clearly and entirely a Republican proposition in a Republican administration.

I want to say further about the sheep, since the sheep question has been started, that we are under a Republican administration to-day and a high protective tariff, and the most singular and remarkable thing is that with your theory and process and rule of protection the sheep in the little State I come from have simply faded out like dew before a July sun. I recall very well that 20 years ago and 25 years ago it was the most common thing in the world in our part of the country to see sheep grazing in the fields. To-day they are a curiosity, and people riding by ask the question, "What sort of animal is that?" They had never seen it in New Jersey. The process of protection has driven them off.

If there are any blessings to come from the decrease in price in the meat supply through the tariff problem, I would suggest to the Senator to go to Lawrence, Mass., and preach that doctrine.

You will find no listeners to the blessings of your high tariff in Lawrence, Mass. There the men, women, and children have been walking the streets for bread, and you have sent fruit there to appease and try to satisfy them. I can take you, as I said before, near my own home, where you will see the working out of your tariff problem, and you have your beggars and paupers, while a handful of men have grown rich. The mill owners have grown rich and prosperous while the most of the people have grown poverty stricken.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. One moment. Your sentences are twice as long as mine. I do not believe you can delude the people any longer with your doctrine of protection. Roosevelt says one thing and Taft says another, and the people between are seeing the light, and that there is no hope of salvation for the struggling breadwinner and toiler with the Republican Party in power; and they are coming over to the broader gospel taught by the Democracy and championed by Wilson.

Mr. HEYBURN. The description of the condition of the people of New Jersey is rather surprising in view of the speech made by the Senator from New Jersey on a recent occasion at a banquet, where he told what a great and prosperous people inhabit the State of New Jersey and how it compares with the most prosperous section of the United States, "and then some."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In spite of your tariff and all things. But what would we have had if it had not been for the tariff?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will address the Chair and get permission to interrupt. Senators will observe the rule.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask pardon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the pending bill I should like to put into the RECORD a brief statement of what I conceive to be the position the Republican Party is placed in with reference to its obligations to act upon this question.

I think the position taken here by the Finance Committee and other Senators not on the committee, who have spoken, that they will do nothing, that they will not act at all, affords the plainest and most concrete illustration of the meaning of a standpatter that we have had in recent times.

There is probably no other country in the world where a great issue like this was submitted to the people directly and squarely, and they decided it, that there was no consequence, as far as the laws are concerned, from the decision of the people. This question was submitted in 1908, and it was submitted again in 1910. At both elections the issue was squarely made as to whether or not the Dingley tariff law—and in 1910 the Payne-Aldrich tariff law—met the deliberate judgment of the people as to a tariff. Both times it was decided that there should be a revision of the excessive items of these bills and, notwithstanding the fact that there have been five sessions of Congress since the campaign of 1908, the judgment and verdict of the people, supposed to be in a self-governing country, has been absolutely ignored, and we are confronted here now, at the moment when we are about to take a vote upon this question, by the great Finance Committee of the United States Senate standing pat on the Payne-Aldrich tariff, saying that they will not do anything, that they will not submit any kind of a tariff bill at all. They do not propose to respond to the judgment of the people.

My opinion is that the worst enemies of the policy of protection that exist in the politics of this country are those who positively refuse under all circumstances to consider any question relating to the reduction of a tariff schedule. Even though they get up to a prohibitive point, even though conditions change so that the rate which at one time was reasonable becomes unreasonable, becomes oppressive to the people, and the people consider the question of relieving themselves from that oppression, there is a certain element, and it seems to be in control of the old organization of the Republican Party, who take the position that they will not consider it, they will not argue it with you, they will not discuss the question of reducing the tariff. That position does more to discredit the policy of protection before the American people than any Democratic bill that was ever introduced in Congress.

There is a great deal of talk about the result of the Wilson bill. I do not propose to defend the Wilson bill, but I think the argument that the hard times that we had some years ago is a sufficient answer to any proposition to reduce the tariff—the argument that all the distress that followed the reaction that came from excessive, wild speculation that swept over the world, not only in this country, in 1889, from which there was bound to be a reaction, just as certainly as the pendulum is bound to swing back—I say the argument that that is a sufficient answer to any demand the American people make for a reasonable revision of the tariff is about as cheap a political argument as could be conceived of.

Another thing that is illustrated by the situation in the Senate now—whatever plan or position you may take as to high or low tariff—is the difficulty of amending the tariff in a legislative body.

My opinion is that it is just about as difficult to do it in this way as it would be for Congress to fix railroad rates, and just about as unreasonable; and it is unworthy of an intelligent people that their political attention should have been occupied practically for a generation to the exclusion of everything else, to the exclusion of more fundamental and more important questions, with the discussion of this particular rate or that particular rate in political campaigns—and that the attention of Congress should be occupied with particular items in tariff duties—with the chief result that after five sessions of Congress, when the Senate is about to take a vote upon a tariff bill, the air is pervaded with the sentiment that nobody knows anything about it.

I voted the other day to perpetuate the present Tariff Board, if you may call is so. I should like to have the opportunity to vote for the creation of a real one, a commission consisting of an adequate number of good men with good salaries; to see a principle laid down by Congress upon which tariff rates should be fixed; and to have this commission in its administrative capacity, acting under the instructions of Congress and subject to its control in all things, acting under the principle laid down by Congress with the power to remove abuses in particular items and excesses in particular schedules as they might arise from time to time from the changing conditions of the country.

I do not think the spectacle that we are all placed in here would then occur. I am not criticising anybody about it. It is due to conditions. It is not at all edifying from the standpoint of the capacity of Congress to manage the important affairs of government in a competent, to say nothing of a scientific, manner.

Now, what is the condition we are in as to this particular schedule, in the face of the assertion, by action rather than by words, of the Finance Committee and of the Senators who are supporting them in this position, that they will refuse to consider any revision of the tariff? It was said for a long time that it ought not to be revised because there was no report of a Tariff Board. I suppose the country, those who had not already lost faith in this administration, resting in absolute confidence, thought when we did get a report from the Tariff Board upon a schedule there would be an effort made in good faith on the part of the organization in control of the Republican Party to revise the tariff in the light of that report; that they would make some use of the report at any rate, even though they did not agree with it. There was a pretense made on the part of everybody, even the Finance Committee, that they wanted to revise the tariff. There seems to be an opinion that the people can be deceived into believing that that pretense is sincere, notwithstanding every condition which has ever been suggested as an excuse for delay has now been performed—the report is on hand, it is the issue on which the campaigns have been fought for the last four years—and still the committee refuses to take any action whatever.

It is unnecessary to refer to this voluminous report because it has been condensed with the aid of experts into the message of the President of the United States. I want to read a few lines upon this schedule from this condensed synopsis of the report made by the President. It shows that the wool tariff is full of excesses; that it does not comply in any way with any principle of tariff revision that the Republican Party has ever advocated; that it is a prohibitory tariff upon the most essential articles that are covered by it—the most important articles, those which are of most importance to the people of this country; that it does not put the American manufacturer upon an equal footing with foreign competitors and give him a fair chance, but that it tends to a monopoly of the American market for the domestic manufacturer. Mr. Taft says in his message:

> That the duty on scoured wool of 33 cents per pound is prohibitory and operates to exclude the importation of clean, low-priced foreign wools of inferior grades, which are nevertheless valuable material for manufacturing, and which can not be imported in the grease because of their heavy shrinkage. Such wools, if imported, might be used to displace the cheap substitutes now in use.

There has been a great deal said here in recent years about the duty of following the leadership of the President, the titular head of the party, about being regular, about supporting the party organization, and here is the report and the conclusion of the head of the party, the head of that faction of the party to which the majority of the Finance Committee belongs, pointing out the benefits that would come to the people from a revision of the tariff; and yet the organization in control of the party stands or sits pat and refuses to do a thing, or to consider the proposition, or to submit to the Senate any plan for a revision in accordance with the recommendations of the President. Proceeding a little further as to wool the President says, and I read this in order that it may go into the RECORD:

> To make the preceding paragraph a little plainer, take the instance of a hundred pounds of first-class wool imported under the present duty, which is 11 cents a pound. That would make the duty on the hundred pounds $11. The merchantable part of the wool thus imported is the weight of the wool of this hundred pounds after scouring. If the wool shrinks 80 per cent, as some wools do, then the duty in such a case would amount to $11 on 20 pounds of scoured wool. This, of course, would be prohibitory. If the wool shrinks only 50 per cent, it would be $11 on 50 pounds of wool, and this is near to the average of the great bulk of wools that are imported from Australia, which is the principal source of our imported wool.
> On tops up to 52 cents a pound in value, and on yarns of 65 cents in value, the rate is 100 per cent with correspondingly higher rates for lower values.

The opposite of what it ought to be.

> On cheap and medium grade cloths, the existing rates frequently run to 150 per cent and on some cheap goods to over 200 per cent. This is largely due to that part of the duty which is levied ostensibly to compensate the manufacturer for the enhanced cost of his raw material due to the duty on wool. As a matter of fact, this compensatory duty, for numerous classes of goods, is much in excess of the amount needed for strict compensation.

Referring to certain classes of goods in which comparisons have been made, he says:

> In fact, however, practically identical fabrics of domestic make sold at the same time at $69.75, showing an enhanced price over the foreign market value of but 67 per cent.

He is attempting to minimize the result upon the market price of goods by reason of this high tariff by saying that it is only 67 per cent higher than the foreign goods. Under this wall that is put up against the foreign competitor we have developed a situation in this country, as everybody in Congress and out of Congress knows, that tends to the production of inferior articles, so that if you want honest quality, if you want first-class material, not only in clothes, but in other things, you have to import it from some foreign country; and yet we pay for the inferior materials manufactured in this country 67 per cent more than the same class of materials can be bought for in foreign countries.

The argument that I have always heard and that always appealed to me, the theory on which the American people have largely based their belief in a protective tariff, was that it provided protection for American labor. It is said that these high rates are necessary to protect the mill operatives. Well, we had a report here a few days ago, after long effort in getting it from the Commissioner of Labor, as to the wages paid mill employees in the principal wool manufacturing center in this country—Lawrence, Mass. It appears from that report that there are 7,275 of those employees, about one-third of the total number of mill workers covered by the investigation, whose wages are less than $7 a week, and that there are many of them whose wages are much lower. The conditions of living there are such that women have to work in the mills along with their husbands, and if they have young children they are compelled to farm them out with neighbors to be cared for away from home while the mothers work in the mills to make enough to support them. In that connection I will send to the desk and ask to have read a letter relating to the character of labor at the present time employed in the woolen mills of Lawrence, Mass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LAWRENCE, MASS., July 5, 1912.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A new situation has arisen in this city since the late strike, and this is the large number of Portuguese Bravas from the Cape Verde Islands which are being brought to this city and placed in jobs formerly held by white men.

These Bravas work for very small wages, and are filling jobs formerly filled by Irish, French Canadians, and Poles. The Pacific Mills and American Woolen Co. are gradually displacing white men working in their storehouses with this cheap black labor.

Most of these Bravas, I am informed, arrive at New Bedford, Mass., in fishing packets which ply between the Cape Verde Islands and that port.

In view of the universal demand for some more rigid restrictions of immigration, it would seem that Congress might consider the advisability of entirely restricting the importation of these blacks, whose presence tends to lower American labor to a level where it can not compete with this class and exist under decent standards of living.

I am,
Very respectfully, STILLMAN EDWARDS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is not any dispute of those facts. There is not any possibility of successfully denying, so far as labor is concerned and its share in the tariff on wool, that it is the cheapest labor, that it is the most ill-paid and least able to protect itself of any labor in the world which can be obtained for the purpose. I understand those people from the Cape Verde Islands speak the Portuguese language. They are apparently descended from the African race, settled in a Portuguese possession, and are now being imported in large numbers to take the place of laborers who were getting less than $7 a week at the time Commissioner Neill made his examination of conditions in Lawrence, Mass.; and that there is a regular line of packets between the Cape Verde Islands and New Bedford, Mass., engaged in the business of bringing this cheap class of labor to displace the labor in the woolen mills, which we are supposed to protect by the tariff.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator refers to a line of packets which brings great numbers of laborers from the Cape Verde Islands. Does he know anything about the line of packets, the size of the vessels, their capacity, or how many voyages they make a year, or how many foreigners they bring in?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I know what was stated in this letter that I have had read just now from Mr. Stillman Edwards, who lives at Lawrence, who ought to know, and whom I consider a reliable authority.

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, he says a schooner, while the Senator says a line of packets.

Mr. POINDEXTER. He says a line of packets.

Mr. LIPPITT. I heard the letter read, and I understood it the other way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will read what he says on that subject:

Most of these Bravas, I am informed, arrive at New Bedford, Mass., in fishing packets which ply between the Cape Verde Islands and that port.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I understand that the fishing packet is merely a fishing schooner that has been running from the Cape Verde Islands to New Bedford and to Rhode Island for two or three years. Its utmost capacity is perhaps 30 or 40 people, and, I think, it makes about four voyages a year, or something of that kind. I can not say exactly, but that is about the number of passengers the vessel can carry and about the number of voyages it makes. If the Senator thinks that that number of people poured into the great population of New Bedford or into the great manufacturing population of New England is a matter of such serious concern as he represents, I can only say that I differ very radically from him, and I imagine he can scarcely be aware of the size of the population in that vicinity.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am thoroughly familiar with the size of the population of Lawrence, at least sufficiently so to know that it has something like 75,000 or 80,000 people and some thirty-odd thousand mill workers. But, aside from this letter of Mr. Edwards, I know from the statements of people on the ground that a large number of these Portuguese Bravas, as they are called, are already there. I am told that there are in the neighborhood of 20 different languages and dialects spoken by the mill employees in Lawrence. That is not American labor; it is not Irish labor; it is not labor from the northern countries of Europe; it is not French-Canadian labor; but it is the lowest class of labor that is imported into this country.

I presume it is the result of economic conditions. It is perfectly natural. It seems to me it would not be necessary to know the facts in this case in order to determine what the conditions were; if one knew that it was perfectly practicable for mill owners to import cheap labor and that the mills were managed by shrewd and selfish business men, he would know without investigation that they do import cheap labor and that they use cheap labor. No matter what the number of men brought in on these packets may be and whoever they may be, or whatever nationality they may belong to, we have report after report from the Tariff Board, from the Commissioner of Labor in his latest report and reports which he has made previously, and from the Immigration Commission, showing that the employees in the woolen mills of Massachusetts do not get their share or any share of the benefits of the tariff. I say that because their wages are based, apparently, upon the principle of paying them barely enough to live and work on. The great mass of laborers in these mills only get a sufficient wage to keep themselves and their families alive and in working condition, or, at least, large numbers of them do; and what benefit has come to them from a 200 per cent or 150 per cent prohibitory tariff?

I do not care to go into the details of these conditions, because it is not necessary; the facts are obvious to everybody; they are known to the country, and are repulsive to American standards. There seemed to be some disposition when a resolution was introduced here a short time ago to avoid these facts and the consideration of them by defeating the resolution of inquiry, by delaying its consideration, by preventing the report after it was made from being printed; by delaying the report after the order was made for it to be printed; but it is impossible to prevent these facts from going before the country. They are known to everyone; they can not but be considered and must be considered by the people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know by what authority the Senator says that there was a delay in having the report printed after it was ordered printed?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I say it by my own authority.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there was no order given, and the Senator has no right to make such a statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not say that there was any order given. The Senator seems to misapprehend what I said. I said that there had been a delay in printing the document. I was informed that it would probably be a month before it was printed.

Mr. SMOOT. There has been no delay.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has it been printed?

Mr. SMOOT. The document will be printed just as soon as it is possible to prepare the cuts which are in the report. The Printing Office can not go to work and make those cuts immediately, and then the report embraces several volumes. The Printing Office is handling that work just the same as they handle every other report, and I say to the Senator now there has not been one single word said to the Public Printer to delay the publication of that work.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad to know that.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is absolutely unfair when he says that there was delay in ordering that report printed. I told the Senator just before he got up in his seat that I was going to ask that it be printed, and all I wanted to do was to comply with the law. The law provides that before any document is ordered to be printed the committee must find out what the cost of the work will be, and then ask Congress for authority to have it printed. A letter was sent to me and handed to me while in the Chamber, giving the amount it would cost to print the report. I called the Senator's attention to that estimate and was going to ask the Senate to order the printing of the report, even if the Senator had not been in the Chamber.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. SMOOT. I have.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad the Senator has made his statement and that was the only thing that was necessary in order to put in its proper light any statement which I made. I am going to state, however, in view of the statement which the Senator from Utah has made, one or two additional facts in regard to that particular matter which I had not intended to state. What I did state and everything that I have stated is exactly true and in accordance with the facts. I say that when that resolution was introduced it was vigorously opposed, and it was unduly delayed, first, upon one excuse and then upon another excuse. Finally it was passed by the Senate and the report was submitted. I was not present when the report came into the Senate, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing. Now, I apprehend—and I may be mistaken about this, because I am not experienced in the Senate—that in the ordinary course a report called for by resolution of the Senate would be ordered printed without the mover of the resolution asking to have it printed, especially if he were not present when the report was submitted to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment. I accidentally found out that the report had been made to the Senate. I say "accidentally," because some friend happened to tell me about it.

I was not present when it was made. I still took it for granted it would be printed. I went to the Senator from Utah, however, some days afterwards, in order to assure myself upon that proposition, and the Senator, by virtue of his committee assignments and his experience and on account of the fact that he has assumed—and we are glad that he has assumed—the interest he has in these printing matters, informed me, here in the Senate, that the report would not be printed. The Senator from Utah stated to me that unless the Senate ordered the report to be printed it would not be printed.

Now, just a little further—a circumstance which the Senator from Utah refers to, when he called the attention of the Senate to the letter he introduced, occurred after I had made the motion in the Senate for an order to have it printed. I made that motion. The Senator from Utah did not make it. I do not think the Senator from Utah ever intended to make any such motion. I do not know that he was called upon to make it. I am only stating the facts in the case.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah did not claim that he made that request, but he wants to say to the Senator from Washington that the Senator from Utah had no authority whatever to tell the Public Printer to print it until the Senate had ordered that it should be printed. The Public Printer would never in the world have printed any report—not this report only, but any report that may come in here—unless the Senate of the United States orders it printed. He has no right under the law to do so; he would violate the law if he undertook to do it; and I would not think, so far as I am concerned, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, of ever giving an order that he should print a document unless the Senate or the House of Representatives so ordered.

Now, Senator, that is exactly the situation; and I do not think it is fair to try to make it appear that there was any disposition on the part of the Senate to prevent the printing of the report.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, if I have done the Senator any injustice, I want to apologize to him for it. I was only reciting the actual occurrence that took place here and the inference I drew from it. I do insist, however, that there was the most unreasonable opposition, in my judgment, and, of course, that is a matter of opinion, to the passage of the resolution calling for an inquiry into the conditions in Lawrence, Mass.

Mr. SMOOT. I never had one thing to say about that, Senator. I never mentioned the passing of the resolution I just called attention to the fact that there had been no unnecessary delay in the printing of the report.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has alluded to opposition to the resolution That opposition, so far as I was concerned, proceeded simply upon the ground that the resolution as originally introduced by the Senator proposed to send an official of a department here to investigate the government of Massachusetts, and the action which that government had taken in regard to certain disorders occurring in the city of Lawrence. I do not think that any State of the Union should be dealt with in that way, and I opposed the resolution on that account.

I had not the slightest objection to an investigation into conditions in Lawrence. I had taken part in making such an investigation two or three years before, and all the facts that have since been brought out here are substantially the same as the facts brought out by the agents of the Immigration Commission, of which I was a member, and who made that inquiry under the directions of the Immigration Commission for the purpose of finding out what were the conditions of the class of immigrants employed at very low wages in those mills and in the coal mines of Pennsylvania, and in one or two other places. Having taken part before in bringing that information to the attention of the public, I of course had no objection to its being done again.

I did object to the proposition of sending a member of a department down there to inquire whether the governor of Massachusetts and the officials of the State had done their duty in a case of disorder.

Now, one word more. At the very time when that resolution was pending in the Senate an investigation into the conditions in Lawrence was on foot ordered by the Bureau of Labor, and was then being conducted; and when this report came in it was the report made by that bureau, on its own initiative, without any reference to the resolution, and the inquiry was made, as a matter of fact, just as rapidly as it could have been made, for it was going on at the very time when we were discussing in this body the point of investigating the action of the State.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it started about that time, probably simultaneously, when we were discussing it, and the discussion probably had something to do with starting it, and I think the discussion and the facts that were brought out at that time, the publicity that was given to them, was responsible for the increase, a slight increase, it is true, but still an increase, in the wages of 125,000 mill employees, or approximately that number, in New England, which took place a very short time afterwards.

My recollection is that the Senator from Massachusetts has stated with perfect accuracy his position with regard to the resolution. He informed me he had no objection to it, and he interposed no objection to it, aside from the provision which he speaks of. At the same time what I said before is true as to the delay and objections made by other Senators, not by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Now, that is practically all I have to say in this matter. There is such a wide margin of excess in this schedule in all of its important items that it is unnecessary to discuss with nicety and detail the exact amount of the reduction. My opinion is that if the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Iowa, which allows a protection of 45 per cent of the value of the raw wool is not a sufficient amount of protection, then the protective-tariff theory fails at that point.

I do not think that the protective policy ought to be carried any further than that. I do not believe that it ought to be possible in this country to tax the people of this country any higher than practically one-half the value of the raw article in order to foster the industry on our shores. I think that that is going to a great extent in creating artificial conditions under which industries can flourish in this country. The enterprise and ambition of our people will find occupation, and it is a great deal better that they should find it along natural lines; that they should find it in things to which the country is adapted and with the materials which are adaptable to be used than that we should go further than to tax a raw product 45 per cent of its value in order to encourage the industry.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has advanced from the point of his discussion to which I wished to call special attention.

The Senator a few minutes ago was discussing the wages paid in the woolen industry and referred incidentally to the wages at Lawrence, Mass. This morning, when I was discussing the same subject, I made the statement that this highly protected—probably the most highly protected—industry in the country was paying the lowest wages, except in one other industry, of any industry in this country. I understood the Senator from Utah——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator now want to withdraw that exception?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not. I understood the Senator from Utah to make the point that what I was saying had reference rather to women and children employed in this industry than to men.

In the hurry, I read this morning the wrong table from the book which I hold in my hand. I have it here, and I should like, if the Senator would permit me, to read from it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will conclude in a moment, and I would prefer, if the Senator is going to read from that book, that he would do so later.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is just a table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Allow me to conclude.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is just a table supporting what the Senator has just stated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it of any length?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it will take only a minute to read it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to show the average amount of weekly earnings of male employees, not female, by general nativity and industry, 18 years of age or over—neither females nor children—in the various industries.

Agricultural implements and vehicles, $13.23; boots and shoes, $12.57; clothing, $14.59; collars, cuffs, and so forth, $12.58; copper mining, and so forth, $12.49; cotton goods, $11.60; furniture, $11.43; bottles, $16.87; plate glass, $12.86; tableware, $14.29; window glass, $15.58; gloves, $11.49; iron and steel, $16.54; iron-ore mining, $11.60; leather, $11.02; oil refining $14.83; silk dyeing, $12.46; silk goods, $12.89; sugar refining, $13.42; woolen and worsted goods, $11.62, it being the lowest weekly rate paid to male employees over 18 years of age of any of these enumerated industries, except that of cotton goods.

Mr. SMOOT. That proves what I said this morning, that the average rate per week, as claimed by the Senator as being paid to employees of the mills, was not of men.

Mr. SIMMONS. These are male employees, and only male employees, over 18 years of age.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not refer to the statement made by the Senator from North Carolina, and he did not hear what I said or he would not have objected to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not hear what the Senator from Utah said.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The rate of duty proposed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa on certain fabrics is:

> On cloths, knit fabrics, flannels, felts, women and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, buntings, and all other fabrics of every description made wholly or in part of wool and not specially otherwise provided for in this act, valued at not more than 30 cents per pound, the duty shall be 16 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 30 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 30 cents per pound and not more than 40 cents per pound the duty shall be 18 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 30 per cent ad valorem.

And so on with an increasing tariff, contrary to the present system, upon the increasing value of the cloths, until there is provision for a tariff on cloths valued at more than $1 per pound and not more than $1.50 per pound, 28½ cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 50 per cent ad valorem.

It is perfectly obvious to anyone exercising common sense and having a reasonable knowledge of conditions in this country and of conditions in these manufacturing towns that the rates provided in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa are in full compliance with any doctrine that was ever advocated by the Republican Party of a protective tariff for the benefit of manufacturers or for the benefit of laborers in their mills.

I regard the attitude taken in this matter as a dangerous one not only for the Republican Party, not only for the tariff, but for the system of government under which we live. If we continue indefinitely to ignore and repudiate the sentiment of the country, the deliberate judgment, the intelligent public opinion in these matters, then the whole system is bound to fail—not only the tariff system, but the Government itself—and will be supplanted by some other form of government that is more responsive to the public will, in which the machinery will be provided, as it is in every other country in the world that makes even a pretense of having self-government by which, when the people have decided upon a principle, that principle will be enacted into law and will become effective upon the conditions under which they live.

The people of this country are the ones who are affected by the tariff. There is not any constitutional authority or any principle of politics which would authorize a tariff for the benefit of a private individual. The only constitutional theory upon which a protective tariff can be based is that protection to the extent of encouraging manufactures in this country is for the public welfare; that the keeping of our money at home; that the establishment of industries and putting them upon an equal basis with the foreign competitor, affording occupation for our citizens, is in the interest of the general public. But if we pervert and prostitute that great principle into a system by which private individuals are benefited at the expense of the public, the system is absolutely wrong in its application, and it will not be very long tolerated by the people.

The people are finding means and making suggestions as to changes, not necessarily in the Constitution, but changes in the operation of the Government. Some people claim to be alarmed at this as though it were changing the fundamental form of government. It is not necessary to change in any respect, possibly, even the Constitution of this country in order to secure means by which the will of the people can be carried out in legislation.

It has been found in some States and is being found in other States, and I trust that before another election comes around—certainly before another presidential election comes around—that without any change—as it is said to be by the enemies of popular government and which I say is not necessary—in the fundamental form of the Government, agencies can be adopted by which such a situation as exists in the Senate here to-day will be impossible. After two campaigns and two elections, where the people have called for a reduction of this tariff, session after session of Congress, after information from the executive department, information from the Tariff Board, after the recommendation of the President who belongs to the party which is in control—all confirming the judgment of the people—all have been ignored because the interests which are concerned in these manufactures are opposed to the reduction. That is the only theory upon which I can conceive that action is refused.

The greatest advocate perhaps of the protective system that the Republican Party ever had, at least the one who was considered by the American people with more sympathy for his attitude upon the tariff than any other high-tariff advocate, was William McKinley; and the last speech that McKinley made was a recognition of the fact that conditions having changed in this country—the so-called infant industries having become adult, the American markets having become completely occupied—that the growth of this country, in population and in all the necessities for occupation, for opportunity, for activity, must have an outlet; that there must be means by which the people could support themselves and an opportunity of advancement; and he advocated a change or a modification in the policy of protection to the extent of cultivating foreign trade instead of making prohibitory schedules, for the opening up of commercial relations with other countries, for the proposition that we can not sell unless we buy, that there can not be a one-sided trade, a one-sided foreign commerce; that if we send our goods to foreign countries, we must exchange them for the products of those foreign countries who buy our goods, in order to enable them to buy.

I want to read just a few lines from Mr. McKinley's speech made at Buffalo, September 5, 1901. He said:

> We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established.
> What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.
> The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.
> If perchance some—

Mark his attitude with reference to the tariff, in contrast with the attitude of those now in charge of the organization here of the Republican Party, an attitude which is opposed to any change. Mr. McKinley said:

> If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

He was not in favor of maintaining, against every argument and against every condition, a tariff enactment as an absolute prohibition of imports from foreign countries.

Our tariff policy ought to be based upon a rate which would put the domestic manufacturer and the foreign manufacturer upon an equal footing in the domestic market, not to give a monopoly to the domestic manufacturer, as is the theory of a great many advocates of excessive tariffs. I have heard it in the House; I have heard it in the Senate. The argument is constantly made, the facts constantly advanced, as to how many imports or if there are any imports into this country of a certain article; and if there are any imports, that fact is urged as a reason why the tariff should be raised. That is a prohibitive tariff. That is not a protective tariff. That is not the Republican policy. The Republican platform of 1908 laid down a certain principle, which has been discussed in the Senate—whether or not it was a correct or a workable principle—that the rate should be the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad.

The distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said to-day that he had thought that that was a practicable working proposition upon which a tariff could be framed, but that he found it to be illusive and impracticable. It is not altogether impracticable to the extent that it should be absolutely discarded. It seems to me that that is an important circumstance that ought to be taken into consideration, so far as it can be ascertained, and there are many other circumstances that ought to be taken into consideration by whatever body may be vested by law with the duty of fixing a tariff at a point where the domestic manufacturer and the foreign manufacturer meet upon equal ground.

The difference in the cost of production is an important consideration, but it may not be conclusive. I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the extent that it should not be considered to the exclusion of other circumstances. It is true that the amount of imports ought to be considered. If we find that the importation of foreign manufactures is reaching a point where they exclude home manufactures from the market, that is a circumstance which ought to be taken into consideration. The theory is all very well, but it is the observation of everyone that theories hardly ever work out, so far as the tariff is concerned, in practice, any more than they do in financial legislation. So we should apply a posteriori as well as a priori reasoning, and should profit by experience and learn from results. From a full view of all the conditions we should determine the rate which would place our manufacturer upon an equal footing with the foreigner.

If a tariff act has heretofore been passed upon a certain theory and we find when it is working out as a law that it has the effect of allowing Europe to occupy our market and crowd out our domestic manufactures, the fact that it is so doing is a fact to be taken into consideration in adjusting the tariff, if natural conditions are fairly favorable, so as to put our manufacturers back upon a footing where they can use their ingenuity and their ability under equal circumstances in competing with the foreigner.

Mr. President, the time to revise a tariff that needs revision is when the opportunity is presented. There was an opportunity upon the original passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill—that law which was said at Winona, Minn., to be the best tariff law that was ever passed, and recently described by the same high official in terms which make it appear to be one of the worst. There was another opportunity in the closing session of the Sixty-first Congress, which followed the election of 1910—which, under our system, was the old Congress—a system which I hope will be changed so that when the people have spoken the Congress which they have elected will make the law instead of the Congress which they have repudiated. But at that time the "titular" head of the party and the stand-pat organization still claimed that no further revision was needed, because of the superior virtues of the Payne-Aldrich bill. As a result of that procrastination and positive refusal to comply with the party platform and campaign pledges the complete power which the Republican Party then had over every department of the Government, over both branches of Congress, and the full opportunity which was then presented to it to fulfill the aspirations, the demands, and the commands of the people has fallen from its feeble hands forever.

Yet I remember that at a previous session of this Congress, through the efforts of progressive Republicans and Democrats, a reasonable revision of the wool schedule was passed by both Houses of Congress. An opportunity was presented then for what remained in the Government of the once magnificent power of the Republican Party, by lending assistance to this measure, to show that it was worthy of the trust which the people had bestowed upon it. The measure was opposed, however, by the Republican organization in the Senate and was vetoed by a Republican President upon the excuse that Congress did not have sufficient information, and that it should delay action until the Tariff Board should file its report. With what degree of good faith that excuse was made is indicated now when the report of the Tariff Board is before us, vindicating and justifying the reductions contained in the wool bill which was passed by Congress in 1911, and the Finance Committee of the Senate, in charge of this great measure, without further excuse, dumbly and sullenly refuses to propose a measure and to assist in guiding it through the difficulties of legislation incident to conflict of opinion and party.

While for the present the inaction of the Finance Committee and the threatened veto of the President suspend the operation of popular government, yet inevitably it will lead to a change in the system so that the control by the people over their system of revenue will be at least as effective as that of other enlightened nations of the world. Public opinion is fortunately still the most powerful, as well as the most intelligent, influence in the Nation, and this repudiation of the demands of the people as registered in two elections will intensify the resentment shown in 1910.

The Republican majority of the Senate now again has the opportunity to redeem the party pledges and keep faith with the people. It declines to act. Opportunity has knocked more than once, but this is its last call upon the "old guard" of the "interests" in this organization. It is "hail and farewell" to the occasion.

The Republican Party, once a great progressive party, born in the service of mankind, has become the unwilling instrument of special privilege in the law. The right of the public to determine the fiscal policy of the Nation has been surrendered to private greed. This betrayal of its faith by those it has placed in the seats of the mighty means the crucifixion, death, and burial of the Republican Party. Under this or some other name it will rise again; but it must and will be regenerated and reborn to the public service. For "that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die"; and that which is now "sown in dishonor" will be "raised in glory."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just a moment more and I shall have concluded my observations upon this amendment.

I listened to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], or a part of them, with a great deal of interest, and possibly with a great deal of profit. I am not much concerned about consistency. Long ago I came to the conclusion that if one went forward and did about what he believed to be right he can very well leave what he does from day to day to take its place with his history or his record without worrying himself much about consistency.

However, I think the Senator from Missouri is somewhat in error, and I believe he will be the first to acknowledge it when he makes a further examination of the subject.

I recognize that, as the proponent of this amendment, the position I occupy is not a very agreeable one. My friends upon the other side of the Chamber propose a revision of the tariff which is so low that I can not support it. My brother Republicans—or a great many of them—insist upon duties so high that I must at every opportunity denounce them. But I have gone forward a good many years, expressing my views from time to time, and I have the very highest confidence that somehow, somewhere, we will secure a revision of the tariff that will at once sustain the industries of the country with adequate protection and that will not burden the people of the country with excessive duties.

The Senator from Missouri referred to the bill introduced last year by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and for which I very gladly voted. I believe it was a high exercise of wisdom and of study and of knowledge presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, and when the bill came before the Senate I very gladly voted for it. I believed it to be substantially right. It was not then just what I would have prepared had I undertaken the task, but on the whole it embodied the view which he entertained and which he vindicated with a wealth of learning and argument, and which I entertained as well.

There is not a great deal of difference between that bill and the one which I have proposed at this time. In some respects the ad valorem duties of that bill were lower than the duties of this amendment. In some respects the ad valorem duties there would be a little higher than the duties proposed here.

The particular difference I think lies in the duty on wool, and as I stated originally the duties of this amendment upon wool are higher than formerly proposed, and I gave the reasons which moved me to adopt the standard which appears in the amendment.

But I beg that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and all the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, will remember that three years ago, when we were discussing the wool schedule and when the subject was illuminated with the knowledge and eloquence of my late colleague, Senator Dolliver, he offered a series of amendments to this schedule. I have not examined those amendments recently and therefore I can not speak with absolute accuracy with respect to them, but as I recall it nearly every Senator, if not every Senator, upon the other side of the Chamber voted for those amendments to the report of the Committee on Finance, which after became the Payne-Aldrich law.

Those amendments received the concurrence of Senators upon the other side of the Chamber then, and I believe that they would receive the approval of Senators upon the other side of the Chamber now. Although, as I said a moment ago, I have not in memory the precise phraseology of those amendments, I venture the assertion that the amendment I have now proposed is lower in every respect than the amendments proposed by my colleague, Senator Dolliver, three years ago, and which did receive the support of my friends upon the other side.

I am not criticizing the fact that you are not going to vote for my amendment now, because the subject arises under different circumstances. I realize that. There is before us a bill——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Prepared for and which embodies the general doctrine of a tariff for revenue alone, but I was only trying to convince the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber that so far as I am concerned I have not changed my views one whit with respect to this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do, gladly.

Mr. BACON. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the difference in the conditions. It is true the Senator is not mistaken when he says that practically all Senators on this side of the Chamber voted for those amendments offered by the late Senator from Iowa, Mr. Dolliver, to the wool schedule. I think that probably not more than one or two, if that many, of the Democratic Senators failed to vote for those amendments. But the Senator will recognize the fact that the statement was repeatedly made in the debates that we voted for those amendments not because the rates of duties proposed in them reduced in those particulars the customs duties to the point that we thought they ought to be reduced, but because they did reduce them below not only the existing law at that time, but reduced them below the bill which was before the Senate for action.

On the contrary, in this instance the bill before the Senate for action is one which has duties lower than those which are now proposed by the Senator from Iowa, even though they may be of no higher rates than those proposed by the late Senator from Iowa, or not so high. But when Senators on this side of the Chamber voted for the Dolliver amendments they were voting for that which was a reduction of rates below the rate proposed in the pending bill. In this instance, although the same rates, if you please, they are higher than the rates proposed in the pending bill, and therefore while Democratic Senators then voted for the amendments they are not inconsistent, but, on the contrary, are entirely consistent when they now vote against the same amendments, because the amendments which in that case would lower the rates of the pending bill in the present case will raise the rates of the pending bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Has stated in much better form precisely what I attempted to state. The circumstances are different. I am not attempting to charge any inconsistency.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am simply suggesting that the taunt that there is any inconsistency here on the part of the proposer of this amendment or on the part of the progressive or insurgent Senators is as baseless as the charge would be that there was any inconsistency on the part of our Democratic friends. Does the Senator from Missouri desire me to yield to him?

Mr. STONE. I wish to make an observation in addition to what the Senator from Georgia has said. The substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa, as I said a while ago, came so late that Senators on this side and Senators generally have had practically no opportunity to examine it critically, but so far as I have been able to examine it, it proposes rates materially higher than the rates proposed in the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] at the extraordinary session last year and finally adopted by the Senate, and which the Senator from Iowa supported, giving to it his valuable and able support from start to finish.

In saying this I do not criticize the Senator from Iowa. He has very well said that he lets every day take care of itself and is not much concerned about consistency. With that statement I do not join issue. It is a matter that every Senator and every man determines for himself; but if it be true that the rates now proposed by the Senator from Iowa are in excess of those proposed last year by the Senator from Wisconsin, which received the sanction of the Senator from Iowa, I wondered why the Senator from Iowa at this time proposed a higher rate of taxation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the amendment was prepared after some study of the Tariff Board report, and it contains my conclusions respecting that report. Far be it from me to claim infallibility in such matters. I am very glad to concede that others may be perfect, but I claim no such quality for myself.

I regret exceedingly that those who want to reduce the tariff to the protective point seem to find no opportunity to carry into effect their desire.

It is one of the unfortunate things that attend this subject. I do not know that there is any way to avoid it. I can not go and will not go below what I regard as the protective point, and there seems to be no way of uniting on a bill that will be a reduction of existing rates and which retains the protective principle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota will state it.

Mr. GRONNA. Am I right in assuming that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be treated as a substitute, and if that substitute is adopted that we can offer further amendments to it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unquestionably.

Mr. CUMMINS. I so understand or I would——

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand what the inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota was.

Mr. CUMMINS. Or I would have removed what I have been convinced is an error in the bill and which was suggested by the Senator from Oregon. If the Senate votes to substitute my amendment for the House bill, I then intend to offer an amendment transferring the hair of the goat from class 2 to class 1.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the information of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Chair will state that the inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota was whether, if the substitute should be agreed to, it would be amendable.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Cummins substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BACON. Did I understand the Chair to say that if the Cummins substitute were adopted it could be amended, or that the bill generally could be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the substitute were adopted it would then become the bill.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I did not understand that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa struck out all of the pending measure. I have not had an opportunity to examine it very carefully.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause.

Mr. BACON. I want to suggest, with the permission of the Chair, that if the substitute is adopted it could not thereafter be amended until the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It can be amended in the Senate, of course.

Mr. BACON. Yes; but not before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct. The Senator from Iowa demands the yeas and nays on his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is absent on account of personal illness. He, however, is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay." I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. CRANE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CRANE] is absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (when the name of Mr. DAVIS was called). I am requested to state that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KERN] is absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS]. Were he present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. I will transfer that pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. Not knowing positively how he would vote on this question, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think myself authorized to announce that if my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER. Upon that assurance I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. OWEN's name was called). The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. If he were present, the Senator from Oklahoma would vote "nay."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. RAYNER's name was called). The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. I am authorized to say that if the Senator from Maryland were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Were he present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], and should not vote had it not been for the statement of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], just now made, that if his colleague were present he would vote "nay." I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. Do I understand his colleague to say that were he present the Senator from Delaware would vote "nay"?

Mr. DU PONT. I made that statement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Upon that assurance, I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when has name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], who is ill and absent from the city. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am requested to state that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] is absent and is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. BRADLEY. Did I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that he was authorized to state that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], with whom I am paired, if present would vote "nay" on this question?

Mr. SHIVELY. I made that statement.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]; but as he and I agree on this question I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON]. If the Senator from Texas were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT. I announce that my colleague [Mr. WETMORE] is necessarily absent from the Chamber on business of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 57, as follows:

So Mr. CUMMINS's substitute was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance some time ago directed the report adversely of the House wool bill. It was understood in committee and, I believe, by the Senate that the majority reserved the right to prepare a substitute bill should they be able to do so in time for action at this session of the Senate. By many it was assumed that it was the duty of the Republicans to frame a bill, because as to the wool schedule the Tariff Board had presented an elaborate report. After many conferences with members of the committee and with Senators not members of the committee on the Republican side it has been possible to reconcile many differences. I now present an amendment for the consideration of the Senate as a substitute for the House bill, and I sincerely hope, while it may not meet the views of all, that it may command the full support of the Republican vote in the Senate. After the bill is read I shall make a brief statement to the Senate explaining its character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of the paragraphs of Schedule K of section 1 of said act, from 360 to 395, inclusive of both, and inserting in place thereof the following:

1. All wools, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals shall be divided, for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon, into the three following classes:

2. Class 1; that is to say, merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote, Down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including Bagdad wool, China lamb's wool, Castel Branco, Adrianople skin wool or butcher's wool, and such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Aires, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, Egypt, Morocco, and elsewhere, and Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used, and also hair of the camel, and all wools not hereinafter included in classes 2 and 3.

3. Class 2; that is to say, the hair of the Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals.

4. Class 3; that is to say, Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, Russian camel's hair, and all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for.

5. The standard samples of all wools or hair which are now or may be hereafter deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classification of wools and hair under this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to renew these standards and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other customhouses of the United States when they may be needed.

6. Whenever wools of class 3 shall have been improved by the admixture of merino or English blood from their present character as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty as class 1.

7. If any bale or package of wool or hair specified in this act invoiced or entered as of any specified class, or claimed by the importer to be dutiable as of any specified class, shall contain any wool or hair subject to a higher rate of duty than the class so specified, the whole bale or package shall be subject to the highest rate of duty chargeable on wool or hair of the class subject to such higher rate of duty, and if any bale or package be claimed by the importer to be shoddy, mungo, flocks, wool, hair, or other material of any class specified in this act, and such bale contain any admixture of any one or more of said materials, or of any other material, the whole bale or package shall be subject to duty at the highest rate imposed upon any article in said bale or package.

8. The duty on all wools and hair of class 1 and class 2 shall be laid upon the basis of their clean content. The clean content shall be determined by scouring tests, which shall be made according to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The duty on all wools and hair of class 1, imported in the grease, shall be 18 cents per pound on the clean content, as defined above. If imported scoured, the duty shall be 20 cents per pound on the clean content, as defined above. The duty on all wools and hair of class 2 imported in the grease shall be 13½ cents per pound on the clean content, as defined above. If imported scoured, the duty shall be 15½ cents per pound on the clean content, as defined above.

9. The duty on all wools and hair of class 3 imported in their natural condition shall be 7 cents per pound; if scoured, 14 cents per pound: Provided, That on consumption of wools and hair of class 3 in the manufacture of carpets, druggets and bookings, mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and portions of carpets or carpeting hereafter manufactured or produced in the United States in whole or in part from wools or hair of class 3 upon which duties have been paid there shall be allowed to the manufacturer or producer of such articles a drawback equal in amount to the duties paid less 1 per cent of such duties on the amount of the wools or hair of class 3 contained therein; such drawback shall be paid under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

10. The duty on wools on the skin shall be 1 cent less per pound than is imposed in this schedule on other wools of the same class and condition, the quantity to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

11. Top waste and slubbing waste, 25 cents per pound.

12. Roving waste, ring waste, garnetted waste, and all other wastes composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this section, 20 cents per pound.

13. Noils, carbonized, 14 cents per pound; not carbonized, 11 cents per pound.

14. Thread waste, yarn waste, 9½ cents per pound.

15. Shoddy and wool extract, 10 cents per pound.

16. Woolen rags, flocks, and mungo, 5 cents per pound.
17. Combed wool or tops, made wholly or in part of wool or hair, 28 cents per pound.
18. Wool and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, but less advanced than yarn, not specially provided for in this section, 28 cents per pound.
19. Worsted yarns composed wholly or in part of wool, advanced beyond the condition of singles by twisting two or more single yarns together, shall be subject to duty at the following rates, namely: On No. 40, 41 cents per pound, and two-fifths of 1 cent per pound additional for every number in excess of No. 40, or one-fourth of 1 cent per pound reduction from 41 cents for every number less than No. 40 to and including No. 12; single worsted yarns shall pay 5 per cent less duty than that imposed by this paragraph on two or more single worsted yarns of corresponding number twisted together. Woolen yarns in singles or two or more yarns twisted together shall be subject to a reduction of 7 cents per pound from the duties imposed by this paragraph on corresponding numbers of single or twisted yarns. All of the above when bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, gassed, or singed shall pay 3 cents per pound in addition to the other duties prescribed in this paragraph. The word "number" appearing in this paragraph, whether applied to woolen or worsted yarns, shall be taken to mean 560 yards of single yarn to the pound.
20. On cloths, knit fabrics, flannels, felts, and all manufactures of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this section, valued at not more than 20 cents per pound, the duty shall be 12 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 25 per cent ad valorem;

21. On blankets composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 30 cents per pound, the duty shall be 16 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 25 per cent ad valorem;

27. The foregoing paragraphs, providing the rates of duty herein for manufactures of wool, shall take effect on the 1st day of January, 1913.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, many Senators assume that part of the unanimous-consent agreement would preclude any amendments being offered to the pending measure. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], however, was offered yesterday, and it was only this afternoon that I was in a position to offer the amendment which has just been read. For this reason, and on account of the lateness of the hour, it is obviously impossible for me to furnish the Senate with full information and data as to the reductions in this amendment. But I have a statement which has been very carefully prepared and I will ask the Clerk to read it. It is short, and I invite the careful attention of the Senate to it. It is in the nature of a report on the bill, I may say, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the statement will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"This amendment is an attempt to make the duties on wool and woolens conform as nearly as possible to the information on that subject which has been furnished in the recent report of the Tariff Board. Schedule K, on account of having a duty on the raw material (wool) and also on the finished product (cloth), has always presented great difficulties. The problem has been how to divide into their respective classes the great variety of articles to which the duties apply and still have rates that would be adequately protective to all articles without being excessive as to some.

"In this amendment, by following the suggestions of the Tariff Board and putting the wool duty on the clean contents of the wool instead of on the wool in the grease, it has been possible to write a measure in which the duties on cloths have been much more evenly distributed than in the present law. The Republican members of the Finance Committee, therefore, are able to present an amendment which they believe has a lower range of duties on all manufactured products, and in no case, so far as they have been able to study the subject, increases the duties. On cloths, for instance, the duties have been reduced from in the neighborhood of 10 per cent on the high-priced and expensive fabrics, which may be classed as luxuries, to as much as approximately 125 per cent on the lower and cheaper grades. On blankets of the higher grades there are reductions running from 12 per cent to 24 per cent and on some of the cheaper qualities, where the value runs from 30 cents to 40 cents per pound, the present duties in many cases have been almost cut in half. The duties on yarns show a reduction of from 8 per cent to 45 per cent under the different conditions of the market. In the same way the duties on tops will show reductions running from 35 per cent to a little over 50 per cent. In spite of these very considerable reductions as applied to the different schedules of the bill, it is believed it will still afford adequate protection to the two great industries—woolgrowing and wool manufacturing—and that if it should be enacted into law, it would enable both the farmer, the manufacturer, and wage earners engaged in this industry to continue to derive their livelihood from those pursuits in which they have been so long engaged and at the same time meet the demands on the part of the consumer for a revision of this schedule."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the spectacle of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] in the rôle of a tariff reformer is so astonishing that I hope we will be forgiven for trying to get some further information about the amendment which he has offered. We could not follow it in the way one could follow one of the old bills and make any sort of comparison. The statement which he has made is, to say the least of it, very scant.

I do not know when the amendment was submitted to the Senate. It is rather a curious thing that the leader of that element of the Republican Party which has been contending most strenuously for taking plenty of time in reforming a great system which spells prosperity or disaster to the industries of the Nation should have gotten into such a hurry at this particular crisis. I do not think the amendment has been submitted very long. I would ask the Senator from Pennsylvania how long?

Mr. PENROSE. The amendment has never been introduced in the Senate as a bill. It was not until this morning that I received authority from my colleagues to present it to this body.

I am not posing as a tariff reformer, Mr. President, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] would assume, and, therefore, I hope he will recover from his shocked sensibilities. I have deferred to the judgment of a large number of my colleagues, who thought that because the Tariff Board had reported it was incumbent upon them to present, if possible, a measure to the Senate. Others thought that, as they did not have control in any way of the other branch of Congress, it would be labor thrown away, and that the time might be devoted to better matters in closing up this session, and that it would be useless to frame a measure.

But this amendment is the result of a general conferring and reconciling of many differences. It is based on the report of the Tariff Board. It is a measure of fair protection and yet a revision downward.

We all concede that Schedule K has been upon the statute books for many years without practically any change. Practically since the McKinley bill the schedule has remained as it is, with a few minor alterations. All of us admitted that it was preeminently the schedule which at an early practical moment ought to be taken up for revision. Whether this is the early practical moment or not I do not know. But it represents the views of Senators, not the views of any particular Senator, because some would have the revision lower and some would not have it as low as it is, but it represents the general thought of those on this side of the Chamber, on behalf of whom I, as chairman of the committee, have introduced the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, when I intimated that this action was rather sudden I did not mean to question any motive. I would not regard it as sudden on the part of some people, but coming from the source whence it does come it seems to me to be rather quick action and the rather volcanic injection into the Senate of new matter.

It is sudden for the Senator from Pennsylvania, at any rate. I remember once Col. Lamar said that somebody came to him and told him that a certain old lady in Mississippi was dead. He said, "Is she? Why, she must have died very suddenly. I had not heard of it. Did she?" The answer was, "Yes, Colonel; she died very sudden for her. She was about three years at it, with the consumption." [Laughter.]

Moreover, Mr. President, I did not say that the Senator from Pennsylvania had been posing as a tariff reformer. To pose involves some factor of voluntary action. A man can not pose without posing of his own free will, posing purposely, posing because he wants to pose. I said that the Senator from Pennsylvania was rather astonishing me by undertaking to act in the rôle of a tariff reformer. I perfectly well understood that that acting was not voluntary at all, but that many months of popular revolt and popular indignation had finally driven him and his colleagues upon the Finance Committee into reluctantly undertaking the rôle of tariff reformers. I acquit the Senator from Pennsylvania of all willingness to play the part. I confess, as must every fair-minded man in America, that he has been driven and coerced into playing the part.

I am glad to know from what he just said that this is a revision downward and not a revision upward. I have not had time to examine the bill. I do not know whether it be a revision downward after the manner of the Payne-Aldrich bill—that is in a Pickwickian sense—or whether it be a real revision downward, but I am willing to take the assurance that it is somewhat downward. The Senator from Pennsylvania has not favored us with the information as to how much it was downward, about what percentage ad valorem of reduction would be made in his bill as compared with the existing law, but at some future time I know he will do that.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, I will state for the information of the Senator and for the information of the Senate that I hope to have put in the RECORD at a very early date the data which will show the changes which this bill has in view, and which data will be in ample time for the consideration of the measure before it is finally disposed of, if it is ever finally disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am delighted even to hear that at some time in the future, after the Senate shall have voted upon the pending measure, there shall be data placed in the RECORD to enlighten the minds of those who have already acted. It reminds me a little of a man who was once president of a club to which I belonged. A point of order was made. The members of the club undertook to debate it, whereupon the president, with a magnificent intelligence, which I always remembered, said, "Boys, suppose you just let me decide the point of order now. I am in a hurry. Then you boys can go on debating it after I have gone home." [Laughter.]

There is another point of information I should like to get from the Senator from Pennsylvania. I know he will be pleased to give it. All people who are acting a novel rôle are delighted to show that they are masters of their part. I would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if this should become a law whether any duties would be left which are over 100 per cent?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator has just heard the bill read, and I will leave the question of duties to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I can answer the question, if the Senator desires.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Next after the possibility of getting the information from the Senator from Pennsylvania I would be delighted, as an actuality, to get it from the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as the Senator concludes his remarks I shall call the attention of the Senate to the reduction in percentages of the great bulk of the articles.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Utah will pardon me. What I asked is whether, if this proposed bill should become a law, there would be left any items contained in it upon which the import duties would be over 100 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. There will not be an item in which the duties are 100 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that is the case, then, Mr. President, Saul hath indeed seen light, because some of the present duties are one hundred and ninety-odd per cent; and it turns out that the Democratic Party, with the people of America behind them, have forced reluctant stand-pat Republican Senators into a reduction, upon some items at any rate, of over 90 per cent of the original duties. At this rate it will not be long before we are all tariff reformers.

Mr. STONE. Will my friend pardon me there a moment? He is speaking of the reductions made in the proposal now pending. The Senator from Mississippi says that the Democrats, with the people behind them, will force our friends on the other side reluctantly to reduce rates on many articles 90 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; to act in the rôle of reducing.

Mr. STONE. To act in the rôle of reducing 90 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From 190 up to less than 100 per cent in some schedules. The Senator is very correct.

Mr. STONE. The statement which the Senator from Pennsylvania dignified as being the report of the majority of the Finance Committee on this measure was that in some instances the reduction was as much as 125 per cent. I was wondering how much was left after the 125 per cent reduction had been made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing to yield for an explanation, but I take it the Senator from Pennsylvania did not mean that 125 per cent of the existing duties had been removed, because, of course, that would bring it down to zero minus 25 per cent. I do not know just what was meant by it, and it might be well, we have time enough, that the Senate should be enlightened upon what was meant by that expression. I understand that when you reduce a thing 125 per cent——

Mr. BACON. It means 25 per cent bounty to the importer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that when you reduce a thing 100 per cent you abolish it, you cancel it. I expect the Senator from Georgia is right. The reduction of 125 per cent means that we give the foreign producer 25 per cent of the import cost of these articles.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think perhaps I can explain what is meant by a reduction of 125 per cent, about which the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Georgia are so humorous. I really do not see anything extraordinary in the fact that it is possible to reduce 125 per cent.

The Senator from Mississippi says that there are some duties that were 190 per cent. If they were 190 per cent it is evident that it is very easy to reduce them 125 per cent. As a plain matter of fact, some of the duties were 215 per cent in the present law, and those duties have been reduced 125 per cent, making them about 85 per cent in those particular instances. So that explanation seems to be clear enough.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me, he may be very strong on other subjects, but he is not on mathematics. That will not do.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to hear why not.

Mr. LIPPITT. It is a matter of mere mathematics.

Mr. WARREN. I would like to have the Senator state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We now understand what was meant, and as we are dealing together in brotherly love we do not care to be hypercritical. I merely want to know what was intended to be conveyed to the human intelligence. It turns out now that what was intended to be conveyed was that certain duties, amounting to 190-odd per cent, would be reduced by 125, leaving a duty of 65 per cent, or 60 per cent if it is more than 190. But still, of course, it remains true that nothing which ever existed can be reduced 100 per cent.

What percentage 125 would be of 190 I have not time to calculate, but it certainly would be less than 100 per cent, so that a duty of 190 reduced to 125 would not be a reduction of 125 per cent nor a reduction of 100 per cent, either. It would be whatever percentage 125 constitutes of 190.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. One hundred and ninety per cent, we will say, on $100 would be $190, or 190 per cent, would it not? Now, to reduce that duty of 190 per cent by taking off 125 per cent upon the first initial or the hundred dollars upon which we base the percentage would, of course, be 125 per cent from 190 per cent. There is no trouble about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this is the first time in my life that I have ever been able to comprehend the confusion of intellect of these same men, otherwise quite honest and quite right, who are high protectionists. It is no wonder now that the American Nation under their leadership has been for years running around in a perfect labyrinth incomprehensible to itself and incomprehensible to the constructors of the labyrinth even.

Mr. President, there are many things to be rejoiced over in an erring and sinful world. One of them is that—

> While the lamp holds out to burn
> The vilest sinner may return.

The entire Republican Party now is composed of party reformers. There is a difference only in degree and not of kind. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has this morning announced his position. I think a fair statement of it would be that he thinks a tariff duty ought to be high enough to put the American producer upon an equal footing with the foreign producer in the American market—if I understood his position—and then having made the two equal, one with the other, leave them to struggle with their wits and with their respective energies in the great industrial competition that would follow, meanwhile hoping that the consumer out of this competition would get something of his due. That is one view.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] at the last session introduced his bill upon this very subject, and I suppose that that is his view, too, expressed in a general view, but it just so happens that the differences in percentages of duties levied are rather serious, showing that it is hard for men to agree where the equal footing line is.

So we come, then, to one reform and then to the greater reform, and various shades between these two may be held to express what would be the result of the action of the Progressive Republican mind.

Now, as to the stand-pat Republican mind, we have various positions there too. I think it is but fair to say that the position of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], if I understand it, is about this: He would not have duties excessive, but he would have them high enough to see to it that not one dollar's worth of anything produced by a foreign producer ever could get into the American market. If I understand his position, that is about it. He seems to think that the Government showers with a free hand largess of prosperity to the people. He seems to think that when you cut down a tax you have deprived somebody of an inalienable and natural right to live and prosper by virtue of the tax.

The position of the Senator from Idaho reminds me of nothing quite so much as the plank in the platform upon which Tittlebat Titmouse ran for Parliament. The plank was drawn up by Oily Gammon and was worthy of Oily Gammon in his palmiest days; it was so simple, so short, so easy to comprehend. He promised, if elected to Parliament, to introduce a bill to give everybody everything without costing anybody anything.

So the Senator from Idaho seems to imagine that in some way the Government can give everybody everything that everybody wants without costing anybody anywhere anything. All you have got to do is to let a man choose what pursuit he would like to follow in the world, and then determine how much tax it would take to enable him to follow that pursuit without any great strenuous exertion, because he insisted upon that. He wanted an ample margin, and then let the Government fix the tax so high that the pursuit chosen by him as his pursuit upon this mundane sphere might be followed up with abundant and easy prosperity without too much exertion and without too much strenuous thought.

That is the highest superlative degree of the stand-pat Republican protective theory. I did not know that they ran their adjectives in any degree except superlative until to-day. I thought that in their opinion a tariff tax fails just exactly in proportion to its failure to cut out the importation of articles made by a foreign producer; that if it let in $100,000 worth, it failed $10,000; and if it let in 10 cents worth, it had failed, too, only it had failed in a lesser degree. But still as a great stand-pat Republican structure it was a failure to some extent at any rate. The Senator from Idaho has informed us that to cut off the prosperity by refusing taxes to any extent at all is a crime against the people, the only difference being that when you make a large cut you have committed a large crime and when you have made a small cut you have committed a small crime. Give everybody everything without taking anything from anybody, make the producer prosper by governmental fiat, adding to his profit by law, without getting the profit from anybody in the world.

Of course, I shall not criticize the Senator from Idaho; no man would dare do that, but it does seem to my poor, weak intellect that parliaments and congresses are not Jehovah, and that they can not create manna and decree that it shall be rained down from heaven. I do not know of any way of giving one man, by operation of law, money to put in his pocket except by taking that money from somebody else by the operation of the same law. If anybody be wiser than I and knows better, I apologize for my ignorance. But up to this good day I have never heard of any way of giving everybody everything without taking from somebody somewhere. So much for that.

Now, we have not got to the positive degree yet, but we have got to the comparative degree, and that is expressed, although expressed reluctantly, by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in the pending bill. God save the mark, Mr. President! I understand, or I infer, rather, from what was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania that even you yourselves have expressed the comparative degree of tariff reformation and have indorsed this bill. I am not, however, astonished at that as I am at the spectacle of the Senator from Utah, the great apostle in the great temple of his protectionism, whose voice has been heard ringing through the circumambient atmosphere in protection of the vested rights of tax-created prosperity from the day he entered the Senate down to this good day. Great must have been the prodding of the bayonets in the rear, great must have been the weight of vox populi upon the Republican diaphragm to have produced this amendment from that particular source.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is a rather strange spectacle to see the trouble, annoyance, and discomfiture of our Democratic friends because of the fact that there has been a measure introduced in the Senate correcting some of the high rates in the wool bill that have never been taken advantage of by any woolen manufacturer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, I hope the Senator has not understood that I was expressing any discomfiture.

Mr. SMOOT. Very much so. I thought it was evident from the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, as well as those of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On the contrary, I was expressing pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the action was quite unexpected and evidently has upset them. I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi with a great deal of pleasure, because they have not touched the question of the tariff at all and have just been made up of a lot of sentences that amount to nothing. I can call the Senator's attention to the fact that Oily Gammon is living in this age, if I am not mistaken, for if the Senator will read the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore he will find that Oily Gammon has virtually written that platform. Mr. President, I am going to take up in just a few words the main reductions that this amendment proposes, but before doing so I want to answer the question——

Mr. STONE. Is the Senator's reference to Oily Gammon personal?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to answer the suggestion as to the rate of 190 per cent or 200 and some odd per cent.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. When the Senator speaks of Oily Gammon having written the platform at Baltimore, does he mean to be personal?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I mean, Mr. President, that that platform has promised everybody everything without costing anybody anything, as nearly as any platform that I ever saw written by any party.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the junior Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senator if this [indicating] is the amendment now under consideration?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. This amendment appears to be dated "June, 1912," and it is less than half an hour since I, for one Senator at least, have been able to secure a copy of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota at what time was the amendment that we just voted down presented to the Senate?

Mr. STONE. Yesterday.

Mr. McCUMBER. What complaint is there, then, if one was presented only yesterday and another one comes in to-day? I want to say to the Senator that the amendment is not proposed by the Committee on Finance. Any Senator has a right at any time to draft an amendment and offer that amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Notice was given the full committee by the majority members of the Finance Committee that they might or they might not, acting individually or collectively, bring in a bill. The act of any one of them is not the act of the committee, and each and every one of them has a right to propose an amendment now or at any time without any preconsideration.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I believe it will be very much better for me to say in just a few words here in explanation of the amendment——

Mr. CLAPP. Before that is done, inasmuch as the question was asked me, I ask for an opportunity to answer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. In the first place the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was before the Senate a sufficient time for a Senator to take that amendment and compare it with the existing law. In the next place, the Senator from Iowa did not bring his amendment before the Senate with the declaration that it was practically a party measure and he hoped it would be supported by the party; and that, too, with less than half an hour in which to consider the amendment. At that I only got a copy by solicitation.

I am told by the Senator offering it that this is the result of a conference on the part of the committee, and it is to be hoped that every Republican will support the measure. There is a difference between an individual offering an amendment in the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Finance undertaking to place a measure before the Senate and make its support a test of fealty with less than half an hour to digest it.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Utah permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the complaint of the Senator from Minnesota is entirely justified. I regret that the proceedings have taken this shape. The Senator, however, must make some allowances for the very many difficulties under which we have labored. I was absent last week from the city of Washington, and during that time I presume, contrary to the expectations of almost every Member of this body, a unanimous-consent agreement was reached by which a vote was agreed to be taken upon this measure much earlier than any Senator had anticipated. Nor have I had any assurance at any time until this morning that any considerable number of Senators would be able to get together upon a wool bill. They all agreed that some action was necessary, because they took the ground that the Tariff Board had reported and therefore the obligation arose and existed for some kind of action on the part of the Republicans.

When it came to solving the details, not only was the widest diversity found in the opinions of Senators, but there was naturally found to exist in the views of the wool growers and manufacturers the greatest difference, which is not surprising when we realize that this is the most complicated of all the schedules of the tariff; that it embraces an industry which covers the continent, from the grower on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains and the Plains to the manufacturers in the East. It is unfortunate that we have not all been able to confer together as freely as we would desire. Many of us have been absent for prolonged periods from the Chamber. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has been absent more or less of the time on proper matters, and I likewise have been compelled to be away. During the month of June a large part of the Members of this body were absent from Washington; and, while I recognize that his complaint is entirely justified, I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not have any feeling in regard to the matter or assume that there is any desire to precipitate matters or to do anything that does not give every Senator full opportunity for consideration and discussion.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. STONE. I have in my hand the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I gather from what he says that this amendment was considered and agreed upon by the Republicans within the last day or two.

The Senator from Pennsylvania speaks of the absence of Senators in June because of important matters which took them away, leading us to believe that there was no opportunity for early action, at least none during that flowery month. I find in looking at this substitute proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania that it was printed in June, 1912.

Mr. PENROSE. That is correct.

Mr. STONE. Well, then, it was not agreed upon after it was printed?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I can answer the Senator's question.

Mr. STONE. If it was agreed upon then, I should like the Senator to tell us, in good faith, why it was not presented here and printed so that it could be fairly considered?

Mr. PENROSE. The amendment the Senator holds in his hand which has been offered by me was prepared by some experts in connection with the Finance Committee after consultation with a great number of persons, including wool growers and manufacturers, and with the valuable assistance of those Senators who had the time and the interest to consider the proposition. Other Senators were working out their own views. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], it is well known, was considering a bill from a somewhat different point of view. I tell the Senator from Missouri candidly and truthfully now that I never had the slightest idea that the bill would even command the support of a considerable number of Senators until this morning. It was prepared by those to whom I have referred, for submission to Senators for their consideration. I do not claim for a moment that there has ever been any formal action on it. There has only been such conference and consultation as there could be among those who were present and available.

It may be, it is not unlikely, that the amendment will fail of passage. I do not claim that it has the full support of Republicans in this Chamber. I have presented it in good faith, having been authorized to do so by the majority of my Republican colleagues on the Finance Committee. After conferences with as many Republicans who are not members of the committee as I have had time to confer with, I present it to the Senate in good faith as a measure based on the lines laid down by the Tariff Board and constituting a considerable reduction in the duties, particularly on the manufactured product.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to address my question to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if I may. The Senator from Pennsylvania concedes that, in view of the fact that this bill has just been presented, the minority Senators, as well as those on the other side who have not been consulted about it, will not have an opportunity to investigate it and compare it with other bills or with the existing law. Does the Senator object to advising the Senate as to what Senators were consulted in the making of this bill?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I would cheerfully advise the Senator from Ohio if I had the information. Different Republican members of the Finance Committee have greatly aided in conferring with other Senators with whom they could have opportunity to obtain conference. I do not pretend for a moment that I have done all the conferring or that I know who has been conferred with or who has not. I can not say. I only entertain the hope—it may be a fleeting one—that this bill, as it is a reduction of existing duties, may possibly command the support of most of the Republican Senators. Perhaps it may not; perhaps it may fail; but, for one, I do not think it matters much, because the other House will hardly consider it, and therefore it is not likely to have a very long career in the Capitol.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to understand from the Chair and from the proceedings that have already been had in connection with this amendment whether it is offered as a committee amendment, as a report from the Finance Committee, or whether it is simply offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. In that connection I wish to say that I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to state, in submitting it and also in the subsequent remarks which he made, that he had consulted with the Republican members of the committee and was authorized by a majority of the committee to report the bill. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in speaking on the subject, spoke of it as an amendment offered by an individual Senator, and said that any member of the committee had the right to submit an amendment.

Of course, we all knew that that was true, but it seems to me a matter of some importance at this stage of the proceedings to understand clearly whether this amendment is proposed on behalf of the Finance Committee, or of a majority of the Finance Committee, or simply as an amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to say just one word further. Whatever the formal method of proposing it may be, if the Senator proposing it states, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has stated, that he does so after having consulted with and obtained the authority of the majority of the committee, then to all intents and purposes it is proposed by the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I was most careful to state the circumstances under which this amendment was proposed, and I regret that the Senator from Washington did not see his way clear to listen to my remarks, which I endeavored to make, contrary to the usual custom, as brief as possible.

When the House bill was originally reported the right was expressly reserved in the committee, as was well understood by the Republican majority of the Finance Committee, to offer an amendment to the bill later on, should they be able to get together and frame a measure on which they could unite.

This amendment is submitted by me, not individually, but as chairman of the committee, not of the whole committee, but in connection with my Republican colleagues on the committee, and not all of them, because not all of them are in Washington and available, but most of them; and all of us know that none of the committees in the Senate command an actual majority of the Republican Senators, although nominally organized by the Republican Party.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I would prefer to go on with my remarks.

Mr. POMERENE. Then I will make my inquiries further on.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can make his inquiries further on.

Mr. President, I wish to recite to the Senate some of the reductions that have been made by the substitute offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but before I do so I want again to point to the fact that has always been conceded, that under the present tariff law so-called woolen goods that are not all wool, but composed mostly of cotton and shoddy, the duty under the present law is exceedingly high. It has often been referred to that certain blankets carry a duty of 165 per cent. As the Senator from Iowa said to-day, and as I have said on the floor of the Senate time and time again, the blanket that carries that rate of duty is a blanket valued at 30 cents per pound or under. The cloths that are valued at 30 cents per pound carry a compensatory duty of 33 cents, and the compensatory duty alone amounts to an equivalent ad valorem of 110 per cent. That comes from the fact that the duty is based on the theory that the cloth is composed of all wool, when, in fact, it is not.

Mr. President, added to that is the ad valorem duty, and it makes the rate exceedingly high, and no one who has read the Tariff Board report will deny that the board in making its report called attention to these excessive duties, but stated positively that the manufacturers in this country had not taken advantage of those excessive duties, and prices of same were regulated by competition. There is a keen competition in that class of goods in this country.

I will begin with woolen cloth, knit fabrics, flannels, and all other fabrics of every description, made wholly or in part of wool, showing the equivalent ad valorem rates of duty under the act of 1909, and under the substitute just offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

These items, under paragraph 378 of the act of 1909, bear an equivalent ad valorem duty of 160 per cent. In the amendment just presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania the duty will be 88⅓ per cent, or nearly one-half reduction.

Mr. President, I call attention to the above by stating that it is upon cloth valued at 30 cents per pound. It is impossible to make an all-wool cloth at 30 cents a pound. So, Mr. President, the reason that the present duty can be reduced as proposed is on account of the excessive duty in the law to-day, as already explained. The manufacturer has not availed himself of the excessive rates. The Tariff Board so reports, and this shows the reduction in that class of goods.

Valued at 40 cents per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem rate is 133⅓ per cent; under the substitute, 85 per cent. Valued at 50 cents per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem rate is 138 per cent; under the substitute, 92 per cent. Valued at 60 cents per pound, under the present act the equivalent ad valorem rate is 123⅔ per cent; under the substitute, 82½ per cent. Valued at——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. For a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I understood the Senator correctly, he said that the confusion or the trouble grew out of the fact of the compensatory duty of 44 cents on 33-cent cloth——

Mr. SMOOT. On 30-cent cloth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On 30-cent cloth, and then he added "which the manufacturer has never used."

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for information; what does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. SMOOT. He has not taken advantage of the full duty that the tariff act would allow in certain cases.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the Senator meant, then, was, that although the manufacturer had had this legal opportunity, he had never used it to its full extent.

Mr. SMOOT. That he never had availed himself of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the law did give him the opportunity, if he could use it, to exploit the consumer to that extent. So what we are to thank is the generosity of the manufacturer and not the law itself.

Mr. SMOOT. I yielded for a question. What I stated is an absolute fact, and the Tariff Board report bears it out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not dispute the fact.

Mr. SMOOT. On cloth valued at 70 cents per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 112⅔ per cent; under the substitute, 80⅔ per cent. Valued at 80 cents per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 110 per cent; under the substitute, 76½ per cent. Valued at 90 cents per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 98⅝ per cent; under the substitute, 76⅔ per cent. Valued at $1 per pound, under the existing law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 99 per cent; under the Senate amendment, 73½ per cent. Valued at $1.25 per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 90⅝ per cent; under the substitute, 72½ per cent. Valued at $1.50 per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 84½ per cent; under the Senate amendment, 78½ per cent. Valued at $1.75 per pound, 80⅞ per cent, equivalent ad valorem duty under the existing law; under the substitute, 75 per cent.

Mr. PENROSE. Perhaps if the Senator from Utah would have the table printed, as the hour is getting late——

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to have the figures put in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. REED. They would be of great service if read.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Missouri wants them read, I hope the Senator from Utah will read them.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to go on.

Now, take wearing apparel composed wholly or in part of wool, except such as are knitted, valued at 30 cents per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 206⅔ per cent; under the substitute, 65 per cent. Valued at 40 cents per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 170 per cent; under the substitute, 65 per cent. Valued at $1 per pound, under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 104 per cent, while under the substitute it is 65 per cent. Valued at $1.50 per pound, under the existing law the equivalent ad valorem duty is 89⅓ per cent; under the substitute, 65 per cent.

CARPETS.

Act of 1909 paragraphs 384 to 391, equivalent ad valorem duty 50 per cent to 100 per cent; the substitute, 50 per cent.

All other carpet the substitute provides a rate of duty of 30 per cent.

While the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania that there was a reduction of from 10 to 125 per cent has been questioned it can not be questioned that there is a difference in the equivalent ad valorem duty of from 10 to 125 per cent.

There are even greater differences, as I have stated, but it does not apply to all-wool goods, but only to goods made from mixtures of cotton or shoddy with wool. If the present law applied only to all-wool goods, there never would have been very much complaint of rates. It is a class of goods made of cotton, mungo, or shoddy, of different kinds, with a compensatory duty upon the basis that they are all wool, that makes the exceedingly high rates. That is what has caused the criticism of Schedule K, but the substitute has been framed to eliminate excessive rates that have given rise in the past to the just criticism of Schedule K.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator can give me a little light. Does the Senator believe that these reductions can be made without injuring the manufacturer or the laboring man?

Mr. SMOOT. I believe so, and I have so stated many times upon the floor of the Senate, as they apply to a certain class of goods.

Mr. REED. The Senator said a little while ago that there had been an excessive duty and that the manufacturer had not taken advantage of it. I take it that he meant by that that the manufacturer's price did not equal the tariff, added to the cost of the foreign article.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I meant.

Mr. REED. To what extent did the manufacturer increase his prices on account of the tariff? Can the Senator say?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will examine the Tariff Board's report he will find a great many cases reported by the board showing exactly what the local prices are increased over the foreign price. Sometimes it did not exceed 40 per cent, sometimes 50 per cent, sometimes 60 per cent, and I believe that the report will show that that is about the limit. If the Senator will figure out the rate on that particular class of goods according to the substitute, he will find that the rates provided for fairly conform to the report of the Tariff Board upon that class of goods.

Mr. REED. Of course I can not do that at this time, because this amendment is offered here, and we are under the duty to vote to-day, and therefore I want to ask the Senator this question—I am trying to get at the facts:

Were the prices which were charged such that this amendment now will force any reduction whatever?

Mr. SMOOT. There may be on some items but very little indeed so far as they apply to that class of goods.

Mr. REED. I mean the classes affected. So the effect of all this reduction is to leave the prices to the American consumer substantially where the rapacity or the good nature, whichever way you want to put it, of the manufacturer has already placed his prices.

Mr. CLAPP. Or may hereafter.

Mr. REED. Or may hereafter.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a very unfair statement, for the reason that it has been said time and time again that on this class of goods there is the strongest competition possible. I have not the time at present to go into details. I have explained it to the Senate several times, and I say that you can not to-day find a manufacturer in the United States who manufactures this class of goods who has made an excessive profit. The American Woolen Co. does not give particular attention to this class of goods. They make, as a general rule, the better class of goods, and I say that the manufacturers of lower grades of goods have not made much of a success financially of their business. I am speaking in general terms.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not going to make a speech, but the amount of the Senator's statement is simply this, that there are tariffs so high that the American manufacturers never fixed their prices by those tariff rates; and that they have now brought in an amendment here which will not compel them to change a single price.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I do not think the Senator wants to misrepresent me at all.

Mr. REED. That is the construction I place upon it and the conclusion I drew.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not a correct conclusion, and it is wrong for the Senator to put that construction on it. I simply said that as to a certain class of goods—and that class of goods is so small a percentage of the woolen business that it is hardly worth mentioning—the Senator and others have always taken these identical goods here and directed the attention of the people of the United States to them as the rates that were being imposed upon all woolen goods. Such is not the case, and when the Senator makes the statement, if he will make his conclusion to reach only those cheap, cheap, cheap goods, not made of wool, but made of shoddy and cotton, I will not object to what he says.

Mr. REED. My interrogatory to the Senator was not directed to the tariff upon cheap, cheap, cheap goods, but it was directed to all of the reductions proposed in this amendment which the Senator discussed.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I misunderstood the Senator's question, and the answer will not apply.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator to say that as to all these reductions they can be made without injuring the business. It follows, therefore, as a confession now made by the authors of the Payne-Aldrich bill, that that bill as to these duties imposed a burden nearly twice as great on the average as they now concede was necessary.

They now say that these tariff duties have not been taken advantage of, because the competition has kept the prices down, that this bill can be enacted without affecting the welfare of the American people. Placing those statements together they mean nothing more or less than this, that these gentlemen have gone in conference and have brought forth a bill which while it makes reductions upon the tariff will not reduce the price a single particle below the place where the manufacturers have voluntarily placed it.

That brings me to this conclusion, that whenever you find Greeks bearing gifts it is well to examine the gift. When we find a tariff-reform measure advanced as this one is at the last hours of this discussion when a vote must be had, when no lengthy discussion can occur, when we find a bill of that kind brought in that was printed away back in the month of June and come to analyze it, we may well conclude that the object of the bill is to deprive the people of argument rather than to reduce the price of articles to the consumers of this country. It looks to me like a fake measure offered for the purpose of throwing a little dust in the air at a time when even the storm can not be analyzed.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, one word and I am done.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from Idaho want the floor?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to make a statement in regard to my own vote.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to make a short statement, but I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in the course of legislation sometimes we adopt methods for the purpose of preventing action which we could not approve of, just as sometimes we move to adjourn in order that the opportunity to do the wrong thing may be destroyed.

I am not in favor of the provisions of this bill, and if I thought it would ever become a law I would perhaps devote some time and ask the attention of the Senate to a considerable discussion of it. But I intend that the vote that I cast—whichever way I cast it—shall not be misunderstood.

I am not going to apologize for the record of the party of which I am a member nor for my own record in dealing with tariff questions. I saw that done once at the expense of the Republican Party. In 1892 we did just about what they are trying to do now. We confessed that the things that had been said about us might be true, and the country said, "Well, if you are not sure about it we will act in the matter," and they turned the Republican Party out of power.

Now, in this case, in my judgment, there is no possibility of this measure becoming a law. I would use it just as I would throw out ballast or throw something to the wolves that were pursuing me, in order to distract their attention and prevent them from doing harm. If I vote for this bill it will be on that principle, not because I approve of it or of any line in it.

The bill is so unfair to the woolgrower as to be dangerous if it could have full life given to it. There is no probability that it will be adopted and become any part of a law, so that if, when the roll is called, my judgment should dictate that I vote for it for the purpose of defeating something infinitely more vicious, and that is the House bill, I will not be misunderstood.

I would do something more even than to vote for a measure of this kind in a sham battle to defeat the House bill. That is the way I feel about it. I am not going to apologize for the legislation of the Republican Party on the tariff question in the past, and I am not going to admit that it has been unwise in tariff legislation or that it has any occasion to apologize.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator, in view of the expression he has just made, whether he understands that the majority of the Finance Committee in reporting this measure is making a sham battle?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Finance Committee has not reported this measure. There has been no meeting of the Finance Committee which considered it.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Pennsylvania indicated that it had the approval of a majority.

Mr. HEYBURN. Indicating a thing and stating it are different propositions. There has been no meeting of the Finance Committee and no poll of the committee in the usual way.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not going to be led into the position of attacking or reflecting upon the Finance Committee or any member of it. I am stating my views and my position and making plain the purport of whatever action I may take in this matter. I expect to continue to be a Republican as long as I live, and I am not going to make any record here that I will have to apologize for in the future. I do not feel called upon to apologize for the vote that I cast for the Payne-Aldrich bill. I cast it with a full knowledge of the responsibility and with a full understanding of the measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. The protective features of that bill met with my approval, and they meet with my approval to-day.

Much has been said that seemed to be upon the assumption that we have no tariff law now on the books and that we were in a position of necessity to enact one. We have a better law on the books than is proposed by this amendment or by the House bill or by any other bill or amendment that has been suggested. I do not propose to go further than to use this as a weapon, if I may, to destroy the House bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desired to ask the Senator whether he could inform the Senate as to the number of members of the Finance Committee who were consulted in the preparation of this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I can answer that only for myself. I was consulted in regard to it frequently. Beyond that I do not feel called upon nor would I be justified in making any statement, nor is it material. The bill is here for what it expresses on its face, to be disposed of regardless of what some one may have said or thought or done in regard to it in the past, and I will not be drawn into a consideration of the action of other Senators. Each must stand upon his own responsibility.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator state how many of the members of the Finance Committee approved this bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the Senator will not make any statement in regard to the private action of any other Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask whether the Senator himself approves it?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am trying to make it plain that I do not approve it.

Mr. POMERENE. And still the Senator expects to vote for it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, that is an improper question, if the Senator will pardon me. I have not voted. I am stating my position in regard to it, and there will be no mistake about it. If I vote for it I will be doing it as I would vote to adjourn to prevent what in my judgment was hurtful legislation.

Mr. POMERENE. As the Senator regards the question as improper, I will withdraw it, but I will ask him another question. Will the Senator advise the Senate as to who outside of the Senate was consulted in the preparation of this bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. By whom?

Mr. POMERENE. By manufacturers or those——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not stand here and recite any private conversation in regard to these matters between any other persons, nor would it be proper for me to do so. If we were to engage upon such a course as that we would have little peace and no harmony in this body.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, Mr. President, the situation seems to be about this, as I gather it: That a few Senators see fit to get together and prepare a bill and to present it here at the last minute and state on the floor of the Senate that they have consulted with certain manufacturers and certain woolgrowers, and they do not tell us who any of those men are who were consulted or who had a hand in the preparation of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under what rule should they tell anyone?

Mr. POMERENE. By the rules of common honesty and fairness with the American people.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, that is rhetoric, but it is not reason.

Mr. President, I am not to be drawn into any such debate as that. I rose merely for the purpose of stating my own responsibility and placing it where I would not be ashamed at any time in the future to face it. That was my purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not know why Senators will still insist that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania becomes a report, or a bill reported from the Finance Committee. The Finance Committee had under consideration the bill that is before the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I understand it is because the Senator from Pennsylvania said so.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator knows himself whether there has been any meeting of the Finance Committee. He is a member of that committee and he can judge for himself whether there has been a meeting to discuss that bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not yield just at this moment. I will state, Mr. President, that the bill the Finance Committee had before it for consideration was the bill which is before the Senate to-day; that the action of the majority of the Finance Committee on that bill was a negative proposition, and that the bill is now being supported from the other side of the Chamber as an affirmative proposition. At the time that bill was reported from the Committee on Finance each and every member of the majority of the Finance Committee reserved the right to offer any amendment that he saw fit. They could act together if they saw fit or otherwise; but it would not be a committee report.

Now, Mr. President, why have we not considered the matter before and why do we bring this in to-day? I will tell you why. Because there was not an agreement between the majority members of the Finance Committee and for reasons which the several members thought were sufficient. What were those reasons? Some of those declared that inasmuch as we had a Democratic House it would be impossible to enact any Republican measure into a law, and therefore it was a waste of time to prepare a bill from the Republican standpoint. I might say that the majority of the majority of the Finance Committee had that view. There were some of us, however, who took the view that it was our duty to present to the Senate a bill that would reflect what we regarded as the Republican standard of protection upon the wool schedule and that that Republican standard of protection should conform as nearly as possible to the report of the Tariff Commission.

It is my understanding that this bill does approximately conform to that report. I was one of the Senators who desired to have a direct vote upon that proposition, so that when any Republican would ask us what our position was in reference to the tariff bill we could answer that we were opposed to the Democratic bill; and if he would ask us again, "What do you propose?" we could say to him, "There is our proposition, and you can wait."

Mr. President, I have never contended for a single moment that there were not some items in the old Dingley tariff law that were higher than necessary, and I have stood ready at all times to take off those excrescences—to reduce those particular items to a point that would still be protective and yet would not be higher than was necessary.

That is the reason why we have that bill or that offer of an amendment before us, because it is not a bill, but simply an offer of an amendment to the pending bill. It has received the consideration of some of us. It may be that when you require a tariff wall of 50 feet the other 100 feet may not do any harm, but at the same time I am in favor of leveling the other 100 feet if they do not need it, even though it may cover and protect only a few articles. That is sought in this bill.

But the main purpose, so far as I am concerned, in insisting that we should have a vote upon this amendment was that we might present to the Senate and to the country at large the Republican view, or, at least, the view of those of the Republican Party who believe in an adequate protection.

There was no attempt to bring in anything in a surreptitious manner, and if we could have agreed before this morning it undoubtedly would have been brought in as a proposed amendment before to-day.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the latter remarks of the Senator from North Dakota would indicate that those who did not favor this bill were not in favor of protection. It is the province of every man to declare his own creed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I so stated I certainly did not state the view correctly. Some of us may differ. I do not believe that any of the Republicans differ upon the question as to what is the general policy of protection. Our differences have always been upon the question as to what is adequate protection.

Mr. CLAPP. It has gone deeper than that. We have differed upon the question whether three or four men sitting as a committee in conference shall be authorized to say that the test of Republicanism in the parallel between proposed legislation and the report of the Tariff Board shall be the opinion of the three or four who may have considered this particular measure; and it must be a measure of difference of opinion, because others who have not had an opportunity to compare this measure with the report of the Tariff Board fail to agree, without an opportunity of comparison, that it does correspond with the report of the Tariff Board.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator who has laid down that test?

Mr. CLAPP. That is clearly deducible from the closing utterances of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I beg to differ with the Senator. That is not a just conclusion from any word or combination of words that I have said in this discussion.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator said he was in favor of this measure, so that the country might know that the Republican principle was protection along the lines indicated by the report of the Tariff Board upon this schedule.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that I believe that this bill did adequately reach the report of the Tariff Commission and conform approximately to it. That was my view. I do not condemn any other Senator who takes a different view, or question his Republicanism. I simply think so for my own part, and I gave that as the reason why I favor voting upon this proposition. The Senator from Minnesota may feel that the duties are still higher than that which would be justified if we adopted the report of the Tariff Commission. I do not think so.

Mr. CLAPP. But, Mr. President, what I object to is the Senator insisting that his view and his view alone, as to whether we have adopted the report of the board, shall be conclusive.

There are others in this body interested in regard to the question, whether or not the Senate and Senators shall be guided by the views of the Tariff Commission. They have a right to compare the proposed measure with the report of the Tariff Commission before any Senator, in my judgment, has a right to assume that the only test of loyalty to the Tariff Commission is the opinion of the one who may have had opportunity to make the comparison.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLAPP. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not accept a criticism based upon any remarks of mine when the remarks themselves will not and can not under any possible view be construed in the manner in which the critic assumes to construe them.

Mr. CLAPP. For some years I have worked in my humble way to get a tariff commission. When we were considering the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill we secured the adoption of an amendment that gave a proposed tariff board a little authority. In order to reduce that authority to the very minimum, the provision giving the board power to ascertain the difference in the cost of production here and abroad was taken out in conference. In order further to minimize the responsibility of that board and reduce it to the mere level of hired men the word "employed" was used in the creation of the board rather than the word "appointed." From that time on I have labored in season and out of season to get a genuine tariff commission. An amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, pending here a day or so ago, provided an appropriation for the Tariff Board, but at the same time in express terms limited its authority to that conferred in the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. So plainly was that evident that, in order to place that amendment on a parity with the provisions of the appropriation acts of 1910 and 1911, I prepared an amendment and left it with the Senator from Kansas so as to give the Tariff Board the authority conferred upon it not only under that act but under existing law. That provision was incorporated as an amendment before the bill passed.

Mr. President, this measure comes in here and, as I understand, now you see it and now you do not see it; one moment it is the action of the committee, the next moment it is not the action of the committee. It comes in here, in a measure, as a test of party loyalty in following the recommendations of the Tariff Board. This amendment evidently was prepared in June, and some one has had it in his possession since that time. I do not know what success other Senators have had, but it was not until to-day that I, for one, learned of the existence of this proposed amendment, and then, on solicitation, I obtained a copy of it.

The people of my State are vitally interested in woolgrowing. I do not want it to be understood by that that I have any sympathy with that process of "swapping" which was such an essential factor in enacting the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. Any reduction of the tariff must of necessity operate wherever the particular article affected is the subject of production; but I do insist when the people of a great State are vitally interested in this subject that either their representatives should be sent home and others sent in their place or their present representatives should have an opportunity to examine and consider a measure which so vitally affects their interest.

Mr. President, a word more and I am through, for I do not intend to detain the Senate. We have fallen upon strange times as a party. Three years ago, when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was before this body, we could not get a Republican conference; we could not get an opportunity as Republicans to talk over that bill, to present our differences, and, if possible, work out an equation. Time and again the then chairman of the Finance Committee was appealed to to call a conference in order that the Republicans might in a Republican conference present and work out their differences, and, if possible, come to some final settlement.

When the railroad bill of 1910 came in here, bristling with reactionary provisions and it became evident that that bill could not pass in the form in which it had been forced into the Senate, the then chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce in charge of that bill was begged time and again to send the bill back to the committee that Republicans might work out if possible their differences without being obliged to work them out upon the floor of the Senate. For three long years it has been impossible for the Republican Members of the Senate to have an opportunity to present their views, to discuss their differences, and, if possible, to produce an equation on any matter except on the open floor of the Senate. Because we have been forced to this extremity there seems to have grown up in certain quarters the thought that no longer is anything necessary except for a few men to formulate among themselves and propose legislation to the Republicans of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. It may be said that we are no longer Republicans because we do not walk up and adopt every measure that is prepared for us, without any opportunity at all as Republicans before judgment is rendered against us of conferring with each other as Republicans. Is it any wonder that under that system of management our party is upon the verge of bankruptcy? Is it any wonder that men resist movements and operations and conditions of that kind?

Mr. President, there has been abundant time in which Republican Senators, if we are to be confronted with a test of loyalty in connection with the action of the committee, might have been consulted and conferred with upon questions which vitally affect a large proportion of the population of our respective States. That is one of the objections which I make.

I declared in 1903 that I never again would vote for a bill unless I had an opportunity, upon my own motion, to discuss, consider, and study the measure. This amendment may be all right; it may be all wrong. I for one shall not vote for it, nor will I vote for any other vital measure unless an opportunity has been presented to consider it, to study it, and to understand its contents.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I have been able to give the amendment some consideration. I am not so much interested in its author as I am in its contents. It makes some very desirable reductions in the rates fixed by the present law, although it does not reduce the duties as much as I think they ought to be reduced. As the matter is presented to me now, it is a question whether I prefer the amendment to the bill which is supported by the minority of the Committee on Finance. I believe that that bill reduces the duties too much; that a number of duties contained therein are too low.

I supported the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] because it comes nearer conforming to my views as to what the duties in the wool schedule ought to be than the bill which is being supported by Democratic Senators. While the duties in the pending amendment are too high, I am inclined to support it in preference to the Democratic measure; but if I do so I shall take every opportunity to attempt further to reduce those duties, either at this session of Congress or the sessions that are to follow, until they are reduced to the point where I think they ought to be.

I supported at the last session the bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on this subject. I believe, as he introduced it, it was an equitable and a just measure, and it represented very nearly indeed the views that I had as to what Scheduel K ought to be. The differences between that measure and the amendment introduced by the Senator from Iowa are not very great in the details. There is a difference in the method in which the duties are levied. It is a question upon which men differ, and there are strong reasons on both sides as to whether or not ad valorem or the specific duties can be more equitably and more justly applied to a schedule of this kind.

I make these remarks in order that my vote when cast may be understood. If I vote for this bill, it will be because I feel that it is better than the Democratic measure. It is safe; it will not injure the industry, while I am afraid that the Democratic measure would.

If it should be passed it does not represent my views, and I shall seek in every way that I can to further reduce those duties when the opportunity comes.

Then, there is another reason why I am inclined to support this measure. It substantially reduces duties. If it could pass the Congress there possibly is some chance for it to meet the approval of the Executive, and thereby we could get some relief from excessive duties, while if the Democratic measure should pass I fear that it would meet the veto, and that the present tariff law would remain until further opportunity comes for its revision. I desired to make these remarks before the vote was taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have never cast a vote upon the tariff either to help or to hurt a political party. It is a matter of no concern to me so far as this economic question is concerned whether a given measure promotes the welfare of the Democratic Party or promotes the welfare of the Republican Party. I have uttered my sentiments from time to time with what I believe to be candor, and with indifference to their consequences so far as the political field is concerned. I feel that way at this moment. If I could vote for the Democratic measure, I would of course vote against this amendment. I can not vote for the Democratic measure for reasons which I have already stated, and which do not imply any disparagement of that proposed legislation.

Inasmuch as I know that this amendment, if enacted into law, would very materially reduce duties which I believe to be excessive, I intend to vote for the amendment. Possibly I have an advantage over some Members of the Senate with regard to the amendment. I have been studying this subject diligently for a good while, and I have not hesitated to talk with Senators on all sides with regard to it. I know what this amendment is. I saw it, or the substance of it, more than a month ago. I saw another amendment prepared—I think I may say without impropriety—by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] some time ago, and I have become familiar with the various propositions that might come before the Senate.

With regard to the amendment now under consideration, I do not think it embodies the teachings of the Tariff Board. I think it too high, and I so declared to those who submitted it to me. I have no hesitation in saying that many of its duties—in fact, nearly all of its duties—are higher than they should be. I concur with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] when I say if I vote for this amendment, as I expect to do, I shall vote for it for precisely the same reason—and it was a good reason, too—that the Democrats in 1909 voted for the amendment proposed by my then colleague, Mr. Dolliver, because it is a step in the direction in which I desire to go.

This amendment makes little reduction in the duty upon wool, but it does make some reduction in this that the duty laid is upon the clean content of wool, and it may—I do not say it will, but it may—permit the introduction under this duty of certain high-shrinkage wools that have heretofore been denied admission to our ports under the inflexible duty of the Payne-Aldrich law. It does not go far enough, but it goes a step in the direction I desire.

I do not concur with it in regard to the wastes of wool manufacture; I think the duties laid are too high. I do not regard them, however, as very material, because after all no matter what the duty on wool is, no matter what the duty on wool wastes may be, no matter what the duty on tops may be, the real question in which the people of this country are interested is, What is the duty on the cloth that is made into garments? What is the duty on the blankets which we all necessarily use for domestic purposes? If these duties are reduced, then, at least, we have a checking tendency against the undue enhancement of prices lest these things shall be imported from abroad.

Now, in that respect there is a very gratifying thing in this amendment. I say here that I had no idea that it would be presented. I had been led to believe that a majority of the members of the Finance Committee were not in favor of such a measure as this; that they regarded it as too low, just as I regard it as much too high; but when I find it here and know that it takes a step in the direction I intend to go, I intend to vote for it.

I said there was a very gratifying reduction in cloth and in ready-made clothes. That reduction is apparent at a glance, and one does not need a long study in order to determine that, while I agree that the subject, generally speaking, is exceedingly interesting.

The duty on cloth and fabrics of every description in the Payne-Aldrich bill, as I said earlier in the day, if not valued at more than 40 cents a pound, is, first, three times the duty imposed upon unwashed wool of the first class; that is 11 cents, and three times 11 is 33. So that upon every pound of fabric—and I pause to say here that this amendment does not change the Payne-Aldrich law so far as the compensatory duties are concerned—so far as concerns that basis, this proposed amendment still levies the compensatory duties upon the entire weight of fabric, which I consider to be fundamentally wrong, but that is the existing law, and I therefore institute the comparison.

The existing law gives a compensatory duty upon cloth fabrics of the value of not more than 40 cents per pound of 33 cents, and if above 40 cents per pound a compensatory duty of 44 cents per pound, with an ad valorem in either case of 50 per cent, until the value rises above 70 cents a pound, and then an ad valorem of 55 per cent. This amendment begins the valuation of cloth at 20 cents. Of course there is not any woolen cloth—all-woolen cloth—that is not worth more than 20 cents. But it begins at 20 and runs to 30, and the compensatory duty is 16 cents and 30 per cent ad valorem.

Now, we come to the first step in the old law with which to make comparison. Valued at 30 and not more than 40 cents, the compensatory duty is 20 cents per pound, as against 33 cents per pound in the existing law. There is a reduction in that class of commodities of 13 cents per pound, and it is worth something to the people of this country to secure a reduction even in that degree.

Then, as I suggested a moment ago, when you rise above 40 cents a pound under the present law the compensatory duty rises to 44 cents per pound. This amendment provides that if it is valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 50, 24 cents a pound. As to all fabrics coming in that classification, the reduction in the compensatory duty is 20 cents per pound, and the ad valorem in the amendment is 45 per cent, whereas in the existing law it is 50 per cent, and so on.

I will not trespass upon the time of the Senate by reciting the entire comparison. I was astonished, just as was the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], to see the amendment here, because I did not suppose the Finance Committee or a majority of its members were willing to make that rate of reduction. I am not imputing any want of good motive, either.

This is a question upon which there can be differences of opinion, and there are differences of opinion. I have mine, and I express it whenever I have an opportunity. But it is most gratifying to me to see the Finance Committee move up to the point indicated in this amendment, and while I shall do all I can do in the days to come to move it still further, I intend to vote for this amendment because I can not vote for the House bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the duties proposed in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania are higher than those warranted by the facts ascertained by the Tariff Board.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator need hardly ask me that question if he had been here to-day. I proposed an amendment, which the Senator from Nevada helped to vote down, very much lower than these duties, and I said that the duties which I proposed were as high as would be justified under the report of the Tariff Board.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, as I understand, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, in its proposed duties, did substantially comply with the findings of the Tariff Board.

Mr. CUMMINS. I refuse to be cross-examined. I have explained my bill fully in detail. I think there are some respects in which it does not comply with the Tariff Board report, in which I corrected the report of the Tariff Board, upon information I believed to be more reliable than that contained in the report. But I do not intend to be cross-examined. If the Senator from Nevada desires to ask me any question in regard to the policy, I shall be very pleased to answer.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is not my purpose——

Mr. PENROSE. One moment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Just a moment.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Nevada, if he will permit me.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to state emphatically that in the opinion of those who have read this amendment it is absolutely based upon the recommendation of the Tariff Board. The greatest care and study were devoted to that voluminous report, and there is not a rate in the amendment which, in the opinion of those responsible for it, is not authorized and justified by the report of the Tariff Board. It may be a question of opinion, and you could frame many different bills under that report, but as far as those who framed the amendment are concerned, they have in good faith endeavored to adhere absolutely and strictly to the recommendations of the board.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It certainly was not my purpose to attempt to cross-examine the Senator from Iowa. I was simply seeking for information regarding an amendment which has been suddenly introduced and concerning the construction of which opinions differ, and I simply wish to know from the Senator from Iowa, who is recognized as an expert on such matters and whose knowledge of the wool schedule is much more accurate than that of most of us, whether he regards the duties fixed by the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania as higher than those fixed by the standard of the Tariff Board?

I was aware, of course, that these duties were higher than those contained in the amendment presented by the Senator from Iowa, but I was not informed as to whether the duties fixed by the Senator from Pennsylvania conformed to those which were warranted by the findings of the Tariff Board.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Nevada was not here when I explained my amendment——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I heard a portion of the Senator's speech.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I must withdraw my suggestion that he was trying to cross-examine me.

I stated that I was endeavoring in my amendment to carry into effect the Tariff Board's report, and that I had availed myself of information which that report contained; that upon one or two matters in which I felt the Tariff Board had erred I declined to accept its findings; but upon the whole, my amendment, as I stated repeatedly, was based upon the report of the Tariff Board, and inasmuch as the duties in the amendment before us now are much higher than the duties in the amendment which I proposed, I assumed that the Senator from Nevada could easily conclude that I believed that the duties in the amendment before us are higher than are warranted by the report of the Tariff Board.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator that I was unfortunately called from the Chamber whilst he was addressing the Senate upon his amendment, and I did not hear that portion of his address regarding the conformity of his bill with the report of the Tariff Board.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to ask the Senator from Iowa a question before he sat down.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not had the opportunity to read the amendment at all. I understand that just a few copies have been printed for the committee. But I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that cloths valued at from 20 to 30 cents a pound were taxed 16 cents specific duty plus 35 per cent ad valorem. Is that correct?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The amendment provides that cloths or fabric that is not more than 20 cents per pound shall be taxed for compensation—I am not including now the ad valorem duty—16 cents a pound. But there is no step of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the ad valorem?

Mr. CUMMINS. The ad valorem is 35 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the tax on cloths between 20 and 30 cents per pound?

Mr. CUMMINS. Between 30 and 40 cents per pound?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Between 20 and 30 cents per pound.

Mr. CUMMINS. From 20 to 30 cents a pound the specific or compensatory duty is 16 cents and the ad valorem or protective duty is 35 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. CUMMINS. But there is no such division in the existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I want to get at. Now, 16 cents specific duty——

Mr. CLAPP. I think the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will pardon me.

Mr. CLAPP. No; it is to correct a mistake.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg pardon. As I read it here, it is 12 cents and then 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was speaking of the duty on cloth from 20 to 30 cents per pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From 20 to 30 cents.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh!

Mr. CUMMINS. I so understood the Senator when I answered, assuming he asked what the duty was on cloth valued at 20 cents per pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I was asking. Sixteen cents on 30 cents is five times 16 cents on a dollar. That is 80 cents, and if you add 35 per cent to that you have 115 per cent. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that there was not a single duty that was above 100 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I still say so. I defy the Senator to get a piece of cloth at 20 cents a pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask the Senator, when I asked him the question, what cloth sold at. I asked him if under any of the provisions of this amendment, if this bill became a law, there would be left a duty of over 100 per cent, and he replied not one.

Mr. SMOOT. I still insist——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, then, here is a provision in the bill for cloths costing between 20 and 30 cents of a specific duty of 16 cents, which is 80 cents on the dollar, plus 35 per cent, which is 35 cents on the dollar; and 80 plus 35 is 115.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not engage in any controversy with the Senator from Mississippi about that. All I say is that in the existing law the duty on the same cloth would be 33 cents a pound and 50 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, and there is no difference between us upon that point. I agree with the Senator. It is a right material reduction, considering the source whence the reduction came.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that the valuation of more than 20 cents and not more than 30 cents is, as the Senator from Iowa says, a bracket put in this amendment which is not in the present law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What has that got to do with the fact that it is over 100 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. It has got this to do with it—that there are no importations of cloth coming into this country of 20 cents a pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I reckon not, with a duty of over 100 per cent on it.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not made. The Senator, if he will go anywhere—I do not care where he goes—can not get cloth made for 20 cents a pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor 30 cents, either.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; he can get it for 30 cents.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Between 20 and 30 somewhere?

Mr. SMOOT. Between 30 and 40. That is where the bracket has been in the past.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At 23 cents you still have over 100 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. But there are no importations of less than 30 cents, and that is where the bracket started in the present law, and with 30 cents a pound it is not a hundred per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I will ask the Senator from Utah this question, as a man of common sense and a constructive statesman of a school peculiarly constructive.

Mr. SMOOT. Are there any other adjectives?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there be no such woolen cloths in the world as between 20 and 30 cents a pound, why did you put a provision covering them in the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. For this reason: That they wanted to start at less than 30 cents a pound because it is a fact that there may be cloths that were cotton cloths and not woolen cloth, but a little wool in it, which would come within that figure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, one word more, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think myself there will be a pound of cloth coming in at that rate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, we are reaching the "darkey in the woodpile." The Senator confesses that this provision would cover not only woolen cloths but cotton cloths—a 10 per cent mixture or a 5 per cent mixture of them. Am I correct or not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say that.

This is what the cloth will cost: Mixed fabrics, flannels, felts, and all manufactures of every description, made wholly or in part of wool, not specifically provided for in this section, valued at not more than 20 cents a pound, the duty shall be 12 cents a pound, and, in addition thereto, 25——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not talking about less than 20 per cent; I am talking about the difference between 20 and 30. Now, that is in the same language. That language is, "composed in whole or partially of wool." I assert the fact that there are a whole lot of cloths that sell at 20, 21, 22, and 24 that are mixed with wool and cotton, and this provision would cover cloths which are 9/10 or 95/100 cotton and the other 1/10 or the other 5/100 wool, and that cloth would come in under this provision and would be taxed 115 per cent. The Senator from Utah this morning, being asked the question, replied that there was not a single provision in the bill which carried a duty of over 100 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I decline to yield further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the Senator for what he has already done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Iowa has expressed my views in reference to this matter much better than I can do. I do not wish to try to elaborate on the points he has made, but I desire to call attention to one or two things which have occurred to me which I think are of some importance at this particular juncture.

I am very much in accord with the idea of having a Tariff Board. I have voted for it, and I have talked for it. I believe in it. I believe its report comes nearer furnishing us with a rational and authoritative basis upon which to fix a Republican protective tariff than any information which has ever been presented to the Congress. Therefore I am inclined in my limited knowledge to be governed to some extent by the views of that board.

Now, it has been undisputed up to date in this discussion that this proposed amendment does come nearer complying with the requirements of the Tariff Board and that report than existing law. It does make a substantial reduction in the direction of making our duties conform to the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. That being true, I can not understand the position some Senators take when they say they can not support it because it does not go as far as they would like. The only argument I have heard Senators make—and the Senator from Minnesota has made it with a good deal of emphasis—is that he does not propose to vote for a proposition which he has not had time to consider.

I remember sitting in this body something like a year ago when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] presented his substitute to the bill then pending. That substitute had not been printed, at least it had not been distributed, as I was unable to get a copy at that time. It was acted upon and passed as a substitute for that measure; and some of the gentlemen who are now complaining at this hurried action voted for it.

Another thing, that day on the floor of the Senate the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] presented an amendment in the form of a revision of the entire chemical schedule, which had never been presented to any committee, had never been printed, and the Senator from North Carolina asked that that bill be passed without reading.

So this is not unusual action that we are taking now on some of these same great subjects. Matters have been presented not wisely, as it has seemed to me, because I agree that we ought to have time to consider them; but this proposed bill has been current rumor, at least, before the Senate for some time, the same as the La Follette amendment, so called, something over a year ago.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TOWNSEND. With pleasure.

Mr. JONES. I suggest also that my recollection is that when one of the substitute measures was up, presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, that measure was voted down, and then after the Democratic bill had been voted down a motion was made to reconsider, and when it was carried the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] presented a very important amendment to the substitute that no one, so far as I know, had seen, and that was voted into the substitute and adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I recall that very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I rise just to make a correction, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Gladly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The bill which I offered as a substitute was introduced on the 21st day of June, and offered as a substitute on the 27th day of July. It was printed and on the desks of Senators for one month and six days before it was offered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I beg the Senator's pardon, if that was true. I inquired for the bill at that time, and was unable to obtain one. I know I discussed it at that time, and I had not read the bill. I am glad to correct the statement that it had not been printed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I remember now, since the Senator mentions that fact, that the day the bill passed the Senate as a substitute I requested an additional print of the bill, because I found on that day that the former print had been exhausted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am obliged to the Senator, because I know it was impossible for me to obtain a copy when I wanted to look it over and find out what the bill was.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may trespass just a moment longer, I will say that the amendment which I offered—and I make this statement in correction of the statement made by the Senator from Washington—I offered while the bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole. It was rejected. The bill was then taken up in the Senate, and I then offered the same bill identically again, after moving a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. JONES. I beg to say that the point of my suggestion was that the important amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina had not been considered by anybody, and it was adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit me, I think he is mistaken about that. No amendment was offered by anybody, except the one that I offered.

Mr. JONES. I know that amendment was offered to one bill. It may not have been the bill the Senator has in mind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It may not have been the legislation we are now considering—the wool schedule. I have that very definitely in mind.

Mr. JONES. It may not have been the wool schedule. It was one of the tariff bills on which the same procedure had been followed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the only object I had in rising at this time was to call attention to the fact that the bill before us is a substantial reduction of duties in the direction of the report made by the Tariff Commission. Therefore, to those of us who believe that we ought to be guided by that and ought to reduce duties to the extent of the difference between the cost of production, it is an improvement; and I can not understand how we can afford to turn this down and have no hope of obtaining anything in its place. The fact I have mentioned that this has not been printed is not the first instance where a tariff bill has been so amended, and without protest as I remember it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], in the nature of a substitute, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is necessarily absent this evening. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). I wish to again announce that my colleague [Mr. KERN] is paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS]. Were my colleague present, he would vote "nay." I will leave this statement stand as to the first part of it.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. Were he present I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay." He not being present I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. OWEN's name was called). The senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. If the Senator from Oklahoma were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PERCY] is absent and paired. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. RAYNER's name was called). I again announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. Were the senior Senator from Maryland present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent from the city and is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr.

SMITH]. If my colleague were present and free to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], who is absent on account of illness, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LIPPITT (when Mr. WETMORE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WETMORE] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURNHAM. I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. BRADLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). A few moments ago I inadvertently voted when paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I desire to withdraw my vote, and to state that I would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce the pair between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 32, as follows:

So Mr. PENROSE's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know whether at this point I can offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that it will be in order when the bill goes to the Senate, but not now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it amendable in its present stage?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not in Committee of the Whole, but it will be amendable when it reaches the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply desire to give notice that when the bill reaches the Senate I intend to offer an amendment providing for the creation of a Tariff Commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will, without objection, be concurred in. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and in connection with it I will say to the Senate that it is the Tariff Commission bill as it passed the Senate in 1910.

It is the bill concerning which there was debate here and some controversy, and which passed over to the other House and was lost there because of the lateness of the hour at which it reached the House. I offer the bill as an amendment, beginning with line 3, as I now send it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 2. That a board is hereby created, to be known as the Tariff Board, which shall be composed of five members, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The members first appointed under this act shall continue in office from the date of qualification for the terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1911, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate a member of the board to be the chairman thereof during the term for which he is appointed. Any member may, after due hearing, be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Not more than three members of said board shall be members of the same political party. Three members of said board shall constitute a quorum. The chairman of said board shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum and the other members each a salary of $7,000 per annum. The board shall have authority to appoint a secretary and fix his compensation, and to appoint and fix the compensation of such other employees as it may find necessary to the performance of its duties.

SEC. 3. That the principal office of said board shall be in the city of Washington. The board, however, shall have full authority, as a body, by one or more of its members, or through its employees, to conduct investigations at any other place or places, either in the United States or foreign countries, as the board may determine. All the expenses of the board, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the members or by their employees under their orders, in making any investigations, or upon official business in any other places than in Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the board. Should said board require the attendance of any witness, either in Washington or any place not the home of said witness, said witness shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of said board to investigate the cost of production of all articles which by any act of Congress now in force or hereafter enacted are made the subject of tariff legislation, with special reference to the prices paid domestic and foreign labor and the prices paid for raw materials, whether domestic or imported, entering into manufactured articles, producers' prices and retail prices of commodities, whether domestic or imported, the cost of transportation from the place or places of production to the principal areas of consumption, the condition of domestic and foreign markets affecting the American products, including detailed information with respect thereto, together with all other facts which may be necessary or convenient in fixing import duties or in aiding the President and other officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, and said board shall also make investigation of any such subject whenever directed by either House of Congress.

SEC. 5. That to enable the President to secure information as to the effect of tariff rates, restrictions, exactions, or any regulations imposed at any time by any foreign country upon the importation into or sale in any such foreign country of any products of the United States, and as to any export bounty paid or export duty imposed or prohibition made by any country upon the exportation of any article to the United States which discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and to assist the President in the application of the maximum and minimum tariffs and other administrative provisions of the customs laws, the board shall, from time to time, make report, as the President shall direct.

SEC. 6. That for the purposes of this act said board shall have power to subpœna witnesses, to take testimony, administer oaths, and to require any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association engaged in the production, importation, or distribution of any article under investigation to produce books and papers relating to any matter pertaining to such investigation. In case of failure to comply with the requirements of this section, the board may report to Congress such failure, specifying the names of such persons, the individual names of such firm or copartnership, and the names of the officers and directors of each such corporation or association so failing, which report shall also specify the article or articles produced, imported, or distributed by such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association, and the tariff schedule which applies to such article.

SEC. 7. That in any investigation authorized by this act the board may obtain such evidence or information as it may deem advisable, but said board shall not be required to divulge the names of persons furnishing such evidence or information; and no evidence or information so secured under the provisions of this section from any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association shall be made public by said board in such manner as to be available for the use of any business competitor or rival.

SEC. 8. That said board shall submit the results of its investigations, as hereinbefore provided, including all testimony, together with any explanatory report of the facts so ascertained, to the President or to either House of Congress, from time to time, when called upon by the President or either House of Congress.

SEC. 9. That upon the taking effect of this act the body now known as the Tariff Board shall transfer to the Tariff Board hereby created all such property and equipment, books, and papers as are now possessed or used by said first-mentioned board in connection with the subjects for which the Tariff Board is hereby created, and thereupon the said first-mentioned board shall cease to exist.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I caught the reading correctly, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the amendment provides that the board shall be appointed after July 1, 1911. It is a mistake of the reading clerk or a mistake in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask that the word "July" be stricken out and that "October" be inserted, and in the year that the word "eleven" be stricken out and "twelve" be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, it is proposed to strike out the word "July" and insert "October," and in the same line to strike out the word "eleven" and insert the word "twelve," so as to read "nineteen hundred and twelve."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, as I understand from the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] this is the identical measure which passed the Senate during the closing days of the last Congress with practical unanimity. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one word first. It seems to me that if it be advisable to have a Tariff Board at all, the one which is now in existence is organized, is going ahead, and is doing the identical work which this new Tariff Commission is expected to do. That is one objection which I have to the amendment.

Another objection is somewhat more serious. After the 4th of March next, when there shall be a genuine Democratic tariff-revision President in the White House, a Democratic House of Representatives, and a Democratic tariff-revision Senate, I do not want anybody of any sort to stand as a pretext for the Congress and the President of the United States to take advantage of to hide behind in order to neglect their duty to the American people, which will be to proceed at once to a revision of the tariff downward, as nearly as existing conditions will permit, to the revenue point.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not understand that there is any tariff commission now in existence. It is true that the President has been authorized to employ certain persons to secure for him, and through him, I assume, for Congress, certain information; but the board as constituted falls so far short of the instrumentality that I think we ought to have that I am sure its existence ought not to stand in the way of the establishment of the commission provided for in the amendment which I have offered. If this becomes a law, of course the other becomes obsolete, and there is no appropriation as yet for it, anyway.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Because of my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). On account of my pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] I withhold my vote; otherwise I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called.) I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. I will say that upon all votes which may follow on this subject I shall stand paired with that Senator.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If he had been present and free to vote, he would have voted "yea." I understand, however, that, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, the pair has been transferred to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. BRADLEY. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT. I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE]. I will let this announcement stand for the remainder of the day. I vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I again announce the pair existing between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. I make this announcement for the rest of the evening.

Mr. BAILEY. I announce my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], and I desire this announcement to cover all the votes for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 26, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in as an additional section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. —. That on the 1st day of January, 1913, a reduction of 10 per cent shall be made in the duties now imposed by law on articles imported into the United States from foreign countries, and that on the 1st day of January of each year thereafter for the period of four years a further reduction of 5 per cent shall be made on such duties until a total reduction of 30 per cent in such duties shall be made: Provided, however, That such reductions shall not apply to duties on articles which have been specifically fixed by law at this session of Congress or shall be hereafter specifically fixed by law: And provided further, That such reductions shall not apply to duties on articles the importations of which during the previous fiscal year have equaled one-tenth of the production of similar articles in the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, we are now considering a Republican bill upon which the stalwart and the insurgent Republicans have practically united. Lest this bill should become a law, it is my desire to perfect it so far as that can be done. The bill thus far relates to one of 13 schedules, the wool schedule, and makes a reduction in the duties covered by that schedule. The purpose of the amendment is to make a gradual reduction in all the other schedules of the tariff, commencing with the reduction of 10 per cent the first year and imposing a reduction of 5 per cent per annum for four years thereafter, until a total reduction of 30 per cent is attained.

Now, I wish to call attention to the fact that the adoption of this amendment will not prevent contemporaneous reductions at this session of Congress to a greater degree upon the general duties of the tariff. The amendment provides that the reduction shall not apply to duties which are specifically reduced at this session of Congress, and it shall not apply to duties which are hereafter specifically reduced. It is simply a dragnet which will cover every duty not specifically reduced either at this session of Congress or at subsequent sessions of Congress.

I say that in reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri yesterday, that my amendment would not apply to those prohibitory and extortionate duties ranging as high as 100 per cent and higher, upon which it is desirable that greater reductions should be made in the near future.

This amendment will not prevent such reductions, and the reductions called for by this amendment will not apply to any duty which is specifically reduced at this session or which may hereafter be specifically reduced.

Now, the next suggestion is that this is a blanket amendment, providing for the reduction of all duties not specifically reduced, and that some of these duties may be and probably are now revenue duties—duties which would meet the requirement of the Democratic platform and of Democratic principles and that it would not be desirable to reduce those duties even in this gradual way.

It may also be suggested that after this reduction has commenced the reduction may bring foreign goods to the importing level, and that if further persisted in it may result in a flood of foreign importations injurious to or destructive of American industries.

I wish to say in that connection that whilst the Republican Party proposes to guard against that contingency, with a view to maintaining a protective tariff, the Democratic Party also proposes to guard against that contingency, for it has pledged itself in its platform to conduct these reductions in such a way as to bring it to such an ultimate conclusion as will not injure or destroy any legitimate American industry. So the platforms of both parties require, where a gradual reduction is made, that a brake shall be provided which will prevent excessive foreign importations to the injury of American workmen or the injury of an American industry. The Democratic Party wishes it turned into a revenue tariff. It is safe to say that any tariff which will permit the introduction into this country in the way of importations of one-tenth of the total domestic consumption will be a revenue tariff, for such a tariff applied to the present dutiable schedule would yield us a revenue of at least $300,000,000 a year.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. If I understand the Senator's amendment, it would apply to any duty now existing which is not changed by legislation at this session or by subsequent legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It would not apply to any duty which is specifically reduced at this session or any duty which is specifically reduced hereafter.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. Then my question is correct. It would apply to any duty which is not changed at this session or by subsequent legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; that is true.

Mr CLAPP. Has the Senator figured out the effect of this proposed reduction in many cases upon raw material as fixed in the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not figured it out. I simply assume that it is perfectly safe for every American industry to have one-tenth of the articles consumed in this country brought from abroad, and just as soon as we reach that importing level this amendment stops the reduction upon that article, so as to prevent any importations beyond one-tenth.

Mr. CLAPP. Many of us were opposed to the Payne-Aldrich bill because, while it was framed under the guise of protection, it sacrificed many interests in this country as ruthlessly as it raised exorbitantly the tariff upon other things, and especially is that true, as I recall, with reference to raw material in many instances.

Now, I am in sympathy with the idea of a gradual reduction in the tariff, but for the same reason that I would not vote for the amendment last proposed without opportunity to study and understand its effect, I, for one, could not vote for the Senator's amendment without knowing what effect it would have upon those raw materials, which in some instances, I believe, were ruthlessly sacrificed and in other instances brought to the very verge of sacrifice under the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I regret very much to hear the Senator announce that he can not vote for this amendment, for I thought it would meet his views. I know that he objected to certain provisions of the Payne-Aldrich bill upon the grounds which he asserts. But I suggest that there is no danger at all, even from his standpoint, in voting for this amendment, for he should recollect that it will not apply to any raw material, one-tenth of the consumption of which is now imported, for that raw material is now producing revenue and the duty imposed upon it is a revenue duty, and I imagine there is not a single raw material of which to-day one-tenth of the total domestic consumption is not imported from abroad.

But we will assume that none of these raw materials is imported from abroad. Is there any danger at all to the occupations that produce those raw materials in this country in permitting one-tenth of the total domestic consumption to come from abroad? Can such an invasion of foreign goods or foreign products be in the least degree destructive? The brake is applied just as soon as the importations equal one-tenth of the total domestic consumption. Nine-tenths, therefore, of the American market is secured to the American producer and only one-tenth of the foreign goods come in as competitive regulators. Under this amendment every prohibitory duty in the tariff will be gradually changed into a revenue duty; under this amendment every excessive duty will be gradually diminished until it reaches a revenue basis.

Under this amendment there can be no sudden invasion of foreign goods dislocating our enterprises and depriving American workingmen of employment, and both parties profess to be solicitous not only for the American workingmen but for American industries, the Democratic Party pledging to conduct this reduction in such a way as not to injure or destroy any legitimate American industry.

Now, I wish to say a word to my Democratic friends upon this subject. This bill may pass this body, though I hope it will be displaced by one which I understand is to be introduced later on as a substitute for it and which will make a greater reduction.

But this bill may pass, and if it does pass it will probably be the only tariff bill that will pass at this session of Congress, with the exception perhaps of the sugar tariff bill. We have the opportunity now to force a reduction which will ultimately reach 30 per cent upon over 3,000 articles enumerated in the different paragraphs of the Payne-Aldrich Act. Shall we not avail ourselves of that opportunity? If we come into power we can make further reductions if we deem them wise. We may take hold of the prohibitory duties and the highly excessive duties and reduce them in much greater degree than is called for by this amendment. It will not at all interfere with our freedom of movement or freedom of action if we come into power, and if we should not come into power we would have forced upon a Republican tariff bill a principle which within five years would accomplish a reduction in the present tariff of 30 per cent.

Were we in power it would be wise to pass such an amendment as this, because it would create alarm nowhere, and the Democratic Party must recollect that it has been defeated every time by the fears of the workingmen—the men employed in the protected industries—whose affiliations are naturally with our party. If we are defeated in the coming campaign it will be because our opponents are able to arouse the alarm not only of the manufacturers, but their employees, by the familiar dinner-pail argument addressed to the question of the daily bread of the laboring classes. Think how many of these men, whose affiliations with us are their natural affiliations, are employed in these protected industries—nearly 3,000,000, I am told, in the steel industry alone.

Would we put it in the hands of their employers to go to them and say, "The Democratic Party proposes such a radical reduction in the tariff as not only to imperil us as manufacturers, but to imperil your employment"? They have been moved by such considerations before, and it has been the scare created among the employees of protected industries in every campaign that has defeated the Democratic Party.

I urge, therefore, upon the Democrats of this body to support this amendment, because it gives an immediate relief, because it procures that relief through the adoption of the Democratic amendment on a Republican measure, because it is a substantial compliance with the pledge of our platform, and because it entirely robs the manufacturers of this country of their familiar argument that the incoming of the Democratic Party will bring destruction to the employees of the protected industries.

But it may be said that when you apply this rate it is a protective rate and Democrats can not in any case vote for protection. I deny that, in the sense that it is an indorsement of the protective policy. The Democratic Party refuses to indorse the protective policy, but it can not ignore the fact that our platform states that a protective policy has existed for years and that the industries of the country have become interwoven with it. Realizing that you can not in a moment destroy the entire protective tariff and bring down these protected industries in ruin upon our heads, we declared in our platform that we proposed to consider the fact that the industries of the country have been interwoven with the protective tariff and we propose to tear them apart gradually and in such a way so as not to injure or destroy any legitimate American industry.

Why did we put that plank in our platform if we did not recognize the fact of protection whilst repudiating the principle of protection? Why did we put that plank in the platform unless we intended in good faith to carry it out and to bring about ultimately a tariff for revenue only, without dislocating American industries?

So, Mr. President, this is an amendment which can be supported by every man who really wants a reduction of the tariff. The Republicans want it. They so declare. The President wants it. He so declares. The Democrats want it. They so declare, and they want it all along the line. Whilst there is a difference in the degree of the reduction, they all unite in demanding a reduction.

Now, here we are in Congress with these three forces opposed to each other—the Democrats, the stalwart Republicans, and the insurgent Republicans—each having different theories as to the amount of reduction, but all of them favoring a reduction. Here we have a political condition in which the House is of one political complexion, the Senate of another, and the President allied to the Senate in political affiliation. It is utterly impossible to carry any measure without the consent of these three parties, these parties who act as the agents of the people with a view to carrying out their demands upon an economic question; and are we to stand in the face of the American people and say that men of intelligence, men of patriotism, in these two bodies and in the executive department can not get together upon any reduction, though all declare themselves in favor of some reduction?

If we assume that position, will not the people be justified in the suspicion and distrust which they now entertain of their public servants? That suspicion and distrust are manifesting themselves now in efforts to take away from representative government the powers delegated and restoring them to the people themselves. Can a body of intelligence like this before the American people confess its inability to join with the President of the United States and the House of Representatives, both of them in favor of substantial reductions in the tariff, and say to the American people we are powerless to do anything? The American people will not say you are powerless to do anything; they will say you lack the sincerity which enables you to carry out your professions. Your action will simply increase the distrust now entertained of representative government.

Mr. President, I will ask for a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada makes the point that there is no quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	du Pont	Massey	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Fall	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. NEWLANDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what I send to the desk as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

The act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by striking out all of Schedule K thereof, being paragraphs 360 to 395, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

364. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1912.

Mr. LODGE. I move to amend the substitute just offered by inserting the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in before the repealing clause. It need not be read again. It is the Tariff Commission act which the Senate has just adopted.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 2. That a board is hereby created, to be known as the Tariff Board, which shall be composed of five members, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The members first appointed under this act shall continue in office from the date of qualification for the terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from and after the 1st day of October, A. D. 1912, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate a member of the board to be the chairman thereof during the term for which he is appointed. Any member may, after due hearing, be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Not more than three members of said board shall be members of the same political party. Three members of said board shall constitute a quorum. The chairman of said board shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum and the other members each a salary of $7,000 per annum. The board shall have authority to appoint a secretary and fix his compensation, and to appoint and fix the compensation of such other employees as it may find necessary to the performance of its duties.

SEC. 3. That the principal office of said board shall be in the city of Washington. The board, however, shall have full authority, as a body, by one or more of its members, or through its employees, to conduct investigations at any other place or places, either in the United States or foreign countries, as the board may determine. All the expenses of the board, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the members or by their employees under their orders, in making any investigations, or upon official business in any other places than in Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the board. Should said board require the attendance of any witness, either in Washington or any place not the home of said witness, said witness shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of said board to investigate the cost of production of all articles which by any act of Congress, now in force or hereafter enacted, are made the subject of tariff legislation, with special reference to the prices paid domestic and foreign labor and the prices paid for raw materials, whether domestic or imported, entering into manufactured articles, producers' prices and retail prices of commodities, whether domestic or imported, the cost of transportation from the place or places of production to the principal areas of consumption, the condition of domestic and foreign markets affecting the American products, including detailed information with respect thereto, together with all other facts which may be necessary or convenient in fixing import duties or in aiding the President and other officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, and said board shall also make investigation of any such subject whenever directed by either House of Congress.

SEC. 5. That to enable the President to secure information as to the effect of tariff rates, restrictions, exactions, or any regulations imposed at any time by any foreign country upon the importation into or sale in any such foreign country of any products of the United States, and as to any export bounty paid or export duty imposed or prohibition made by any country upon the exportation of any article to the United States which discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and to assist the President in the application of the maximum and minimum tariffs and other administrative provisions of the customs laws, the board shall, from time to time, make report, as the President shall direct.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of this act said board shall have power to subpœna witnesses, to take testimony, administer oaths, and to require any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association engaged in the production, importation, or distribution of any article under investigation to produce books and papers relating to any matter pertaining to such investigation. In case of failure to comply with the requirements of this section, the board may report to Congress such failure, specifying the names of such persons, the individual names of such firm or copartnership, and the names of the officers and directors of each such corporation or association so failing, which report shall also specify the article or articles produced, imported, or distributed by such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association, and the tariff schedule which applies to such article.

SEC. 7. That in any investigation authorized by this act the board may obtain such evidence or information as it may deem advisable, but said board shall not be required to divulge the names of persons furnishing such evidence or information; and no evidence or information so secured under the provisions of this section from any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association shall be made public by said board in such manner as to be available for the use of any business competitor or rival.

SEC. 8. That said board shall submit the results of its investigations, as hereinbefore provided, including all testimony, together with any explanatory report of the facts so ascertained, to the President or to either House of Congress, from time to time, when called upon by the President or either House of Congress.

SEC. 9. That upon the taking effect of this act the body now known as the Tariff Board shall transfer to the Tariff Board hereby created all such property and equipment, books, and papers as are now possessed or used by said first-mentioned board in connection with the subjects for which the Tariff Board is hereby created, and thereupon the said first-mentioned board shall cease to exist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to change one word in the amendment which I offered in order to perfect it. I have not the copy before me, but I wish to change the last word in the amendment offered from "twelve" to "thirteen," so that it will read that it will go into effect "January, 1913," instead of "January, 1912."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The print of the bill which I have was offered as an amendment on the 27th day of July, 1911. I will say to the Senate that the amendment as now offered is exactly in the same form in which it was adopted on the 27th day of July, 1911—not one word or figure is changed in the bill as it was then adopted excepting the change which I have just now suggested.

Mr. STONE. I was out of the Chamber for a while during the reading of the amendment. Some one has said that the provisions contained in the amendment authorize the appointment of a tariff board.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say that the Senator has been misinformed. This amendment is identical with the bill which was passed by the Senate on the 27th day of July, 1911.

Mr. SIMMONS. But, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, as I understand the Senator from Missouri, he means that an amendment has been offered to the substitute creating a tariff board.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has offered an amendment to the amendment which I have proposed, but that has not yet been adopted. The amendment as I propose it is in exactly the same form in which it passed the Senate on the 27th of July, 1911.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. CLAPP. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before with reference to my pair.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Because of my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] I withhold my vote; otherwise I should vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I will transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PERCY] is absent and paired, as stated, with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is not in the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present and free to vote, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I would vote "yea" were it not for my pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRADLEY. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], but for which I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (after having voted in the negative). I inadvertently voted. I wish to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 35, as follows:

So Mr. LODGE's amendment to Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to be inserted at the end of the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

That the act entitled "An act to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes," approved July 26, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be a duty of $2 per ton paid on the paper described in section 2 of said act.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have not kept advised as to the result of the conference upon the previous tariff bill. As I understand, a similar amendment was added to one of the tariff bills. Is not that so?

Mr. STONE. To the steel bill.

Mr. CLAPP. It was added to the steel bill. I ask if that bill has yet been reported from the conference?

Mr. PENROSE. For various reasons the conferees on that bill have not yet met. In order to make this very praiseworthy amendment absolutely secure, I would urge its being added to this bill.

Mr. CLAPP. I certainly commend the interest of the Senator from Pennsylvania in repealing the so-called Canadian tariff bill. Half of that effort last year would have prevented its passage.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have always voted against reciprocity; but I am satisfied that this amendment is offered for the purpose, or if not for the purpose it might have the effect, of defeating the bill which the Senate may pass to-night. For that reason I shall vote agains it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator would look at the amendment he would see that notice was given over a month ago that it would be offered as an amendment to the wool bill, so that it is not an amendment merely urged at this particular moment.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is offered here to embarrass this bill, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it would embarrass your bill I think it would operate very well, indeed, and I should be very glad to see it adopted for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt the Senator thinks that way.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, like the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who has just spoken, I also have always voted against Canadian reciprocity, and last year I set forth my reasons very fully for doing so. I have done so because in my opinion it is a most unjustifiable discrimination against the agriculturists of this country, forcing them to sell their products in a free market and then to buy everything they use in a protected market. For that reason I voted against it, and unlike the Senator from North Carolina, I shall continue to vote against it just as long as I can stand up.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, while there may be such a thing as future punishment for those who are gifted with immortality—that is, the human race—I do not think it pertains to a tariff bill. I do not believe in pounding a dog after it has been killed. So far as the Senate is concerned, we have already passed an amendment repealing the Canadian tariff bill. It is asserted, as a great many things during the last three years have been asserted, that the measure containing that amendment will be vetoed. If that is true, this measure also will be vetoed if it contains that amendment, and, as I believe, we should try to get some reduction from the tariff bill of 1909, having already voted to repeal the Canadian tariff bill which no man ever heard me mischaracterize as "reciprocity"—we might as well call a one-handled jug a pair of apothecary's scales as to call the Canadian tariff bill reciprocity. I shall vote against embarrassing this bill by putting that amendment upon it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator is very certain that this bill as it will be passed is going to be vetoed and is certain that the other will be vetoed also, why can not the Senator vote his sentiments against reciprocity on this bill the same as on any other?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator in his zeal has fallen into the habit of being incorrect. My suggestion was that this bill might be vetoed if it contained the amendment repealing the Canadian tariff bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can assure the Senator that I do not believe it will be vetoed for that reason, though it may be vetoed for other reasons.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, Mr. President, a new light dawns upon the situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope if there is a new light the Senator will follow that light.

Mr. CLAPP. Then we do have authority as to what the President will do with these tariff bills.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am very certain that this tariff bill will not be vetoed, because it contains a repeal of the reciprocity law which now stands as an offer to Canada.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I merely wish to remark that it is refreshing to find some gentleman who can speak with authority as to the inner consciousness of the President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am not willing to vote for any amendment that will embarrass this bill. With that view, whilst I have always favored a tariff board, I vote against an amendment providing for a tariff board in this bill, assuming that if a tariff board amendment were attached to this bill it would fail to receive a good deal of support it would otherwise receive.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, so long as the reciprocity measure remains as it is to-day, it is within the power of Canada to adopt it and make it effective as an international regulation, and in view of the unanimity with which this measure is condemned on both sides of the Chamber and in the agricultural communities of the United States it looks a little like trifling with a very dangerous question to leave entirely in the hands of a foreign government the right to give effect to a measure that is so generally repudiated in this Chamber and throughout the country.

A few days ago in some of the northern Provinces of Canada, notably Saskatchewan, they again voted their approval of the reciprocity arrangement of the Laurier government with the United States, and we can not tell when that people may determine to give effect to this law; and to leave it lingering on the statute books where vitality may be given to it at any moment by a foreign people surprises me greatly, especially when the sentiment on both sides of this Chamber is against it. For one I shall never lose an opportunity to recall that measure and to invalidate that act.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, so far as it is proper within the rules of senatorial discussion, I will say I am surprised that those who have already voted to reduce the tariff should seek to embarrass a real substantial reduction by trying to force men into the false attitude of voting against the Canadian tariff bill. I for one will not be driven into any such position, and as long as we have already passed an amendment denouncing the Canadian tariff bill, and that is already in conference, I am not going to be deterred from an effort to get a fair, substantial reduction upon a schedule that has been denounced by men in both parties, by the effort to throw me into the false attitude of voting against the Canadian tariff bill.

I believe if ever there was a wrong committed it was in forcing that bill through the Senate, a measure which in 1904 had been denounced in the Republican textbook as a Democratic fraud, and yet a Republican President, with all the vainful lure of patronage, forced that measure through the Congress with a Republican Senate a year ago. No threat, no intimation, no suggestion, and no effort by those who are not really in earnest in a fair tariff reduction for which the people are looking, having appealed to the Senate for a relaxation and a lessening of the burdens of the wool schedule, will deter me from unmasking at this time the efforts to embarrass this measure now pending by attempting to throw Senators into the attitude of being hostile to the repeal of the Canadian tariff bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, to lapse into southern dialect for a minute, "it is mighty pore policy and pore ethics to beat the devil round the stump."

Mr. CLAPP. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Gentlemen need not rise here and attempt to fool the country, they need not even attempt to fool themselves, with the pretense that the object in offering this amendment is to secure the repeal of the Canadian reciprocity law. They know, we all know, and the most ignorant human being in the United States will know, that the object in offering this amendment is to prevent the measure to which this is sought to be attached from becoming a law, to prevent, if possible, its passage through the House of Representatives.

It is mighty good policy and mighty good ethics to be honest with one another and to be honest with the country. There is not a man within the sound of my voice who does not know that the object in offering this amendment and the object in supporting it is not the amendment itself, but to embarrass the measure upon which it is proposed that it shall be ingrafted.

Mr. THORNTON. As one Member of the Senate, I deny the correctness of that statement as applied to myself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There may be now and then somebody so innocent as to be totally ignorant of the transaction, but that is the transaction. That will be the effect of this transaction. Every man in the world is charged with knowledge of the natural consequences of his own act, and when it is offered here at this particular juncture, and when it is voted for at this particular juncture, that is the natural and necessary consequence in the opinion of almost everybody, to wit, to prevent the passage of this measure through the House, and therefore to prevent its going to the White House.

The President vetoed a similar bill that came from the conference, upon the ground that the Tariff Board had not had time or opportunity to report; upon the ground that he did not possess the information, without the aid of the Tariff Board, upon which he could base his action. The Tariff Board has reported, and this bill can not, in my opinion, be pronounced by anybody to be in conflict with their final report.

The last pretext, therefore, that the President has for vetoing this bill has passed into history and out of sight. If he be sincere in desiring to get the advice of a Tariff Board, the benefit of its investigation and its judgment, those will now be before him, although they were not before him when the bill was last passed, and he will have to take the responsibility before the country, or else he will have to confess that the pretext of being guided by the Tariff Board was a pretext and is a pretext.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suppose there is not a Senator here who opposed the reciprocity measure more than I, and there is no Senator here who desires more earnestly to see it repealed and removed from the law of the Nation, but it seems to me unnecessary to attach its repeal to every measure that may come before the Senate. We have already attached it to one measure, and I think I am violating no confidence when I say that before this debate shall have come to an end—I mean the debate upon the three measures covered by the unanimous-consent agreement—there will be another opportunity for Senators to vote for the repeal of the reciprocity act, and for that reason I do not intend to vote to attach it to this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the devil seems to be chasing himself around the stump without anybody getting after him. I first find the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] objecting to this proposition because he is afraid that the President will veto the bill. Then I find another chasing him around under the proposition that it is introduced for the purpose of preventing the bill passing the House.

Mr. CLAPP. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLAPP. I have at no time in this debate or any other debate suggested that the President would veto a bill. To me it is a matter of no consideration. His is the function to sign or veto; mine to vote for or against the measure. What I said was if he was going to veto another bill because it contained this amendment, the same argument would apply to this bill with the amendment attached.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then we have another one chasing him in the same direction and suggesting another reason why the bill in which the provision repealing the reciprocity act had already been inserted will be vetoed. Very well; if it will be vetoed in that bill, then there is no excuse for not putting it on another bill, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. CLAPP. It would embarrass this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. It will embarrass this bill? If the Senate and House are in favor of the repeal of that reciprocity provision, there is an opportunity now to put it through both Houses; and if the Senator would not vote for a proposition, no matter what the President would do or what the other House would do, then he should not talk about embarrassing this bill. He should vote according to his own conscience and his own judgment as to whether it is a proper measure in either instance, and let the House take care of itself. I would vote for this bill and this proposition if I stood alone. I am not in favor of the bill as it now comes before the Senate because I think it is a little too low; that is all. I do not think it gives adequate protection. The Senator who introduced it thinks that it does. Neither of us believes that the Democratic measure gives the adequate protection.

I hope the Senators will give every one the same credit for trying to act according to his own judgment in matters of this kind. I am perfectly free to say that I would hope that the bill would be defeated in the House; but whether it should be defeated or not, I shall vote for the repeal of this reciprocity provision on every bill to which it can properly be attached, and if it fails in one it may stand a chance of passing through in the other. That is all there is to it.

When it was voted on before the Senator who then offered it, although it had been offered in the Senate before, declared that he would move it upon every tariff bill that came before the Senate. I did what he stated he would do—move it upon each one, or one that was similar to it. I am willing to vote for it. Undoubtedly the majority is against putting it on this bill, but I do not think that the motive of any Senator ought to be challenged.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if he will vote for the measure now pending if the amendment he proposed is attached to it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not vote for it if I thought it was wrong. If I thought it was wrong, then I would make it just as near right as I could. If there is any other good feature that I could attach to it I would do it.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the question I was asking, whether he would or would not. He knows whether it is right or wrong now, I presume.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought I made it quite plain that I believed the amendment was a little too low, and as such I was not in favor of it. I do not think that it is anywhere near as low as the Democratic bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] made the statement that no one could say but that the bill under consideration was not in conformity with the Tariff Board report. I say that the Tariff Board report not only once but more than once denounces the ad valorem duties of a wool tariff bill, and I will read from just one part of the report in relation to the ad valorem duties which the proposed bill carries. On page 394 of the report the board says:

> The economic objection to an ad valorem duty on wool arises from the fact that the amount of duty paid, since it fluctuates with the foreign value of the commodity, would not be adjusted to the needs of the Government, of the consumer, nor of the American woolgrower. A speculative change in the market which increased the price of wool would automatically lead to an increase in the amount of duty at the very time that the manufacturer is most hampered by the existing high price, when the consumer most needs relief, and the woolgrower is most prosperous. On the other hand, a fall in price brings a reduction of duty at a time when the woolgrower is at greatest disadvantage and when manufacturers can best afford to pay the tax.

Specifically disagreeing to any kind of plan of an ad valorem duty upon the woolen schedule. That is only one of the many instances in this report where the board takes that same position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY (when his name was called). I again state my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I would vote "yea" if I were at liberty to vote.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Because of my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], as already announced, I withhold my vote. If I were not paired I would vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] and the transfer of that pair to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). I again announce that my colleague [Mr. PERCY] is absent on emergent business; that he is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]; and that if my colleague were present and not paired he would vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). I again announce the absence from the city of my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] and his pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present and free to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I would vote "yea" if I were not paired.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I beg to announce my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the transfer of my pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who has been here all day and all the evening, was necessarily called from the Chamber. For that reason he did not answer to his name.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Borah	Fall	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Gallinger	Massey	Smoot

So Mr. MCCUMBER's amendment to Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I would vote "nay" if I were not paired.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous vote of my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I withhold my vote on account of my pair, as already announced, with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. OWEN's name was called). I again announce the pair of the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). I again announce the absence from the city of my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] and his pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present and free to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I would vote "nay" if not paired.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—39.

Ashurst	Cummins	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hitchcock	Overman	Stone

Bryan	Johnston, Ala.	Poindexter	Thornton
Chamberlain	Kenyon.	Pomerene	Watson

Bradley	Curtis	Gore	Richardson
Brown	Davis	Jones	Sanders
Burnham	Dillingham	Kern	Smith, Md.
Chilton	Dixon	Lea	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Foster	Owen	Warren
Crane	Gamble	Percy	Wetmore

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still in the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments proposed, the question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY (when his name was called). I make the same statement as before regarding my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I withhold my vote for the reason before stated, being paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. CRANE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CRANE] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. He is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I withhold my vote on account of the pair already announced. Otherwise I would vote "nay."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. KERN]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). I again announce the absence from the city of my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] and his pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present and free to vote he would vote "nay."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. The senior Senator from that State advises me that his colleague would vote "yea" if present. So I am obliged to withhold my vote. Otherwise I would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and the transfer as before to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. I withhold my vote in his absence.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 40, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Ashurst	Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bacon	Cummins	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Ga.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 340) making appropriation to be used in exterminating the army worm, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RAVAGES OF ARMY WORM.

H. J. Res. 340. Joint resolution making appropriation to be used in exterminating the army worm, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in exterminating a dangerous pest commonly called the army worm, now devastating crops in various sections of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to state in that connection that the Secretary of Agriculture wanted a larger amount, but in view of the fact that the joint resolution had passed the other House and come over here, he said he could use the amount thus proposed to be appropriated. I have supplemented the amount in a joint resolution I now present as a separate measure, and I ask the attention of other Senators to it. I ask that the joint resolution I now introduce be read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) making appropriation for checking ravages of the army worm was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 26, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 25, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God and Father of us all, whose essence is love, to whom discord, sin, and iniquity are abhorrent, teach us the art of living together in peace and harmony that we may reflect Thy love in the home, in society, in the affairs of state, and be worthy of the gifts Thou hast bestowed upon us, Thy care and protection, boundless love and good will. That Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and with the accompanying report (No. 1062) ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

Mr. FITZGERALD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported Senate joint resolution 122, providing for the payment of the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and with the accompanying report (No. 1063) ordered to be printed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 20728) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and I ask unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments on the bill and——

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will defer his report until later. We have a special order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will withdraw the request for the present.

The SPEAKER. We will attend to this as soon as the gentleman from Nebraska gets through with his speech. Under the special order of yesterday the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is recognized for one hour, or so much thereof as he desires to use.

DELEGATES TO CHICAGO CONVENTION.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned yesterday I was talking about the Federal officeholders in the Southern States in relation to their activity in trying to control the delegation and the policies of the Republican Party. I had just finished, I believe, giving a list of delegates to the Republican national convention from Mississippi, together with their salaries. I want to continue briefly the consideration of the subject in a continuation of delegates from the Southern States to the national convention. I have, Mr. Speaker, a list of the Republican State central committee of the State of Alabama for last year. This was the committee that conducted the campaign, as far as the Taft Republicans were concerned, for the selection of delegates to the national Republican convention at Chicago. Upon that State committee there were 49 members—46, I believe—and there were not to exceed 6 private citizens on that committee, and I think only 5. I have tried to find out the salary of the different members of that committee, but have been unable to get the salary of all of them; but as near as I can reach a conclusion the salary list of that committee of that State alone amounts to somewhere in the neighborhood of $50,000. I have examined the list of the Republican delegates and alternates to the Chicago convention from the State of Georgia. Georgia had 26 delegates in that convention, and every man knows there was and will be no possibility of the nominee of that convention or any other Republican convention that will have any show in getting the electoral vote from the State of Georgia. Every white man on that delegation with the exception of one was a Federal officeholder. The combined salaries of the delegates and alternates alone amounted to $52,000. So I might go on through all the Southern States, with results about the same. If we investigate the salary list of delegates and alternates of Republican committeemen in those States, where in reality there is no Republican Party, it would amount to somewhere in the neighborhood of a million dollars, in my judgment. That is more than these organizations down there are worth either to the country or to the Republican Party.

Let us see what the average Republican delegate to a national convention costs the country. If you will take the delegates from that portion of the South where there is in reality no Republican Party you will find that, on an average, practically every delegate is drawing out of the Treasury of the United States between two thousand and twenty-five hundred dollars per annum. Since the national convention meets only once in four years, this would make the average delegate from this particular section cost the country in the neighborhood of $10,000. When we consider that under our political methods we can not elect a President of the United States until he is first nominated, we can get some kind of an idea of what must be the power of the political machine that can control this patronage. More than 200 delegates in the Chicago convention were absolutely controlled in this way. We complain against the use of money in politics, and rightly so. We pass laws to prevent it, and rightly so. What would be the outcry if some aspirant for the Republican nomination would boldly announce in the public press that he was willing to pay $10,000 a vote for delegates coming from this section of the country? And yet, under our system, the man or the machine in control of the party in these States can practically offer that amount for the votes of delegates in the national convention, the only difference being that the payment of the money must be made by the taxpayers through the Federal Treasury.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. AUSTIN. Speaking about the delegates from the Southern States, does the gentleman mean to include in that statement the delegates from the State of Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not.

Mr. AUSTIN. I hope, then, he will make the exception.

Mr. NORRIS. I have made no investigation with regard to the Tennessee delegation, and I make no reference to it. Now, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], in his speech here yesterday—and you must remember I am going over this subject somewhat at length in answer to what he said yesterday—made the claim that the postmasters and Federal officeholders in Texas were in league to defeat the renomination of President Taft. If there was a Federal officeholder in the State of Texas who had the courage and the nerve to come out in the open and assert his independence and be against the renomination of President Taft, he ought to have a chromo at least, and perhaps a pension.

I want to take up the Texas situation again, with reference to Federal patronage. The manager of the Taft Republicans in Texas, as I have stated, was H. F. MacGregor, and I am going to read from some of his letters that have been printed, and I will read extracts from them as they were printed in Collier's Weekly. Mr. MacGregor had charge of the Taft campaign in Texas. I hear gentlemen around me make some remarks about Collier's Weekly not being good authority, but these letters have been published, these particular ones in this particular publication were published on the 8th day of June, 1912, and I have never yet heard them disputed. Why, if the gentleman wants to take the word of Mr. MacGregor, if he will go down and examine the Texas papers, he will find an advertisement inserted in those papers in Texas during that campaign, signed by MacGregor—inserted with his authority—stating in effect that Lyon, the national committeeman, would not be considered any longer as a dispenser of patronage in Washington, and that as soon as President Taft was triumphantly reelected, other men would have charge of the distribution of the political pie.

We forget sometimes that the Republican Party in a good portion of some of the Southern States is only an organization of men holding Federal appointments. Now, this Mr. MacGregor wrote a letter to the postmasters, and I am going to read you an extract of a letter that he wrote to one of them down there. He told him in the beginning of the letter that the postmaster's personal interest, as well as his political interest, was with the Taft Republicans. He says:

I am going to look to you for the result in your precinct particularly, and, as far as your influence extends, to the county convention as well. And I wish you to send to me a list of those that support you in your efforts who may be entitled to special credit.

Would a Texas postmaster know what that meant? Is there any doubt in any reasonable man's mind as to the meaning of that language? But let us consider for a moment the activity of Mr. Brush, who, as I have already explained, was one of the trio who had charge of the Taft campaign in Texas. Remember that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] complained of the activity of the Federal officeholders in Texas. See what this man Brush writes to one of the faithful:

Those who are factors in assisting us are the ones that will be recognized when the time comes to shake the "plum tree."

There is no doubt about that language. Federal patronage in Texas being used against the renomination of President Taft? In the same letter he uses this language:

Lyon and the Federal officials have the "fleshpots," and it is up to us to capture them; then we will have some of the good things.

That is significant. Even a Taft Texas Republican would understand that. Let us now see how Mr. James W. A. Clark, the other member of the Taft trio carries on his part of the fight. In a letter written to Mr. Yates, of Forney, Tex., Mr. Clark says:

You, therefore, on receipt of this, proceed to organize your county, appoint precinct chairmen, for the purpose of going into the conventions when called and capture them.

Now, listen:

If you can not capture them, withdraw and hold a convention and elect delegates to county convention, contesting the others, and from county convention to State convention on same lines. Capture, if you can, but do not be captured.

Talk about the holding out of Federal patronage as a reward for political activity! It seems to me that it is demonstrated even in Texas, and every man whether he was a Federal officeholder or not, who was opposing the renomination of President Taft in Chicago, from Texas, was taking his political existence in his hands and jeopardizing it, as these things clearly show.

Patronage in the control of political conventions is one of the great evils of our country, and in this connection in further answer to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I want to refer briefly to the State of Ohio. And in referring to Ohio I want to take it up in connection with Massachusetts. In Massachusetts, where the Roosevelt delegates were elected by a small majority, but where the State went for Taft by a small majority, we found Mr. Roosevelt the next day in an open statement to the effect that in his judgment those delegates ought to comply with the expressed wishes of the Republicans of Massachusetts and vote for Mr. Taft in the convention.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I will, in just a moment.

Following soon after the primaries in Massachusetts came the primaries in Ohio, and Roosevelt was ahead of Taft there by a plurality of 47,000. And then came the State convention, and we find Mr. Taft sending a dispatch to his manager in Ohio, Mr. Vorys:

I hope my friends will not consider for a moment the suggestion of a compromise in the State convention.

That is the first sentence. I will print the entire dispatch of both of these gentlemen, and I hope I will be able to have them printed in parallel columns, so that every man can read. But the President winds up:

I hope, therefore, that you and my friends will press the contest to the end of the State convention.

Boiled down this means: "The primary defeated me by 47,000, but capture the convention and get the delegates." In Massachusetts the delegates were technically for Roosevelt, and the dispatch comes:

The vote of the Republicans is in favor of Taft, and you ought to be for Taft.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman know the circumstances of the election in Massachusetts when those delegates were chosen?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going into that. I know what was stated in the newspapers at the time, and have a general idea, the same as I presume anybody else has.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Let me ask another question. Did those delegates retire from the contest or did they attend the convention and go for Roosevelt?

Mr. NORRIS. They did not retire from the contest; they did not vote for Roosevelt in the convention.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Did they do anything else in the convention?

Mr. NORRIS. If I had been one of them—if Roosevelt and every other man in the United States had said to me, "Vote for Taft in that convention," I would have disregarded Roosevelt's advice after what happened in Ohio, and said to the Ohio delegates, "I will carry out the wish of the people as expressed in their preferential vote in Massachusetts if you will lay down your machine methods in Ohio and do the same."

This advice Mr. Taft sent to Ohio had good effect. The workers went to work. They went into the convention, and by a small majority, I think, of twenty and something, they captured it and got the delegates for Mr. Taft, and they voted for him and were counted. But what happened? The plum tree that the Texas man spoke of was shaken in Ohio not long ago, and, at least, a portion of these men that were following the commands that emanated from the White House have already received their reward. And the country, in the payment of the salaries, is footing the bill.

Here are the two statements, one from Roosevelt and one from Taft:

STATEMENT OF MR. TAFT AFTER OHIO PRIMARIES HAD GONE AGAINST HIM BY 47,000 PLURALITY.

I hope my friends will not consider for a moment the suggestion of a compromise in the State convention. The votes involved are not necessary to my nomination. I can stand their loss and am content to be beaten in Ohio, but I can not yield my votes by agreement.

The principles that we represent are too important to the country to lose anything by our voluntary concession. I hope, therefore, that you and my friends will press the contest to the end of the State convention.

STATEMENT OF MR. ROOSEVELT AFTER MASSACHUSETTS HAD VOTED FOR TAFT BY A SMALL MAJORITY.

In Massachusetts the ballot contained the names of eight candidates for delegate at large, with printed under each the words, "Pledged to vote for Theodore Roosevelt," and also contained a column in which the voter was to express his preference as to whether I or Mr. Taft should be nominated as President. It would seem unlikely that a majority of the voters would both vote for the delegates pledged to me and at the same time express a preference for Mr. Taft, but apparently this is what has happened. Such being the case, and on the assumption that the preferential vote is for Mr. Taft, I hereby announce that I shall expect these delegates at large to disregard the pledge to support me and support Mr. Taft; and if any one of them hesitates so to do I shall immediately write him and urge him with all the emphasis and insistence in my power to take the course indicated and support Mr. Taft in the convention.

In this fight I am standing for certain great principles which I regard as vital to the present and future welfare of this Nation. My success is of value only as an incident to securing the triumph of these principles. Foremost among these principles is the right of the people to rule and the duty of their representatives really to represent them in nominating conventions no less than in executive or legislative offices. If the majority of the rank and file of the Republican Party do not wish me nominated, then most certainly I do not wish to be nominated.

My aim has been to get the genuine expression of their genuine desire, precisely as, if nominated, I should desire to get at the polls the genuine expression of the majority of the whole people, because my only purpose in being elected President would be to put into effect certain principles and policies in which I ardently believe and which I could not possibly put into effect unless I had behind me the hearty support of the majority of our citizens.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

New Mexico furnishes us another illustration of the power of Federal patronage. New Mexico was entitled to eight delegates in the convention. I am informed by Mr. CURRY, the Republican Member of this House from New Mexico, that he attended the State convention of that State, called for the purpose of selecting these eight delegates. The convention was divided between the adherents of Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt. They consulted together and decided to compromise the fight, and they therefore made an agreement that there should be four delegates from New Mexico for Roosevelt and four delegates for Mr. Taft. With this understanding eight delegates were elected, and, while no instructions were given, it was supposed that the understanding by which this compromise had been agreed upon would be carried out in good faith. I have no personal knowledge of this matter. As I have said, I have my information from the New Mexico Representative, who is a Member of this House, and who is now present in the Hall. What happened in Chicago? New Mexico cast seven votes for the renomination of Mr. Taft. Three of the Roosevelt delegates, for some reason, voted for his renomination. It is a peculiar coincidence that since the adjournment of the Chicago convention a relative of one of these Roosevelt delegates who voted for Taft has been appointed United States marshal of that State. It is also interesting to note that another one of these Roosevelt delegates who voted for Taft has himself been appointed receiver of a land office, and is now drawing the salary of that position. Of course, I suppose when Mr. Taft made these appointments he had no knowledge that these men were even members of the Chicago convention. He appointed them very likely entirely upon their merits, but the common ordinary person, like myself, can not help but connect these incidents I have related and reach the conclusion that there may be a possibility that they have some connection with each other.

WASHINGTON STATE CONVENTION.

Now, in connection with this patronage proposition that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has raised, I want to go back again to the State of Washington. Yesterday in my remarks I did not discuss the State convention in Washington to any great extent. I discussed the different county conventions and primaries and meetings of different committees that were held, and I am not going over that part of it again.

The chairman of the Republican State committee of Washington was a lawyer, and I judge from my investigations that he was a bright one, too. His name was Beverly W. Coiner. When the delegates commenced to come in at Aberdeen, Wash., there was considerable anxiety, on account, as I explained yesterday, of the Roosevelt fellows, even according to the Taft figures, coming within three of controlling the convention, and something desperate had to be done. This man Coiner was equal to the emergency. From his brain there emanated a rule that he put through the State committee, a rule that provided for the control of the convention—something that has never been done before in a Republican State convention in Washington; and one of the provisions of that rule was that no man should be admitted to the hall unless he had a ticket signed by Beverly W. Coiner. They got possession of the hall, took down the fire escapes, closed the doors, with the exception of one, and stationed policemen there, and admitted no one who did not bear a card with this man's signature on it.

Delegates went there and presented their credentials, and were refused admission and thrown into the street by the police. Few of the Roosevelt delegates knew anything about this rule. No publicity had been given to it. They knew nothing about the issuing of cards. They did not know where to get them, anyway. But the leaders of the party in that State, including the governor, came there that morning and tried to get the two factions to harmonize the difficulty. Finally the men representing the Roosevelt faction, and Coiner, representing the Taft faction, made an agreement that the State convention, which was called to meet at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, should not meet until 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and in the meantime they would try to harmonize these differences.

Notwithstanding that agreement, the Coiner fellows went into the hall under the conditions that I have narrated and held their convention, and nominated delegates and instructed them for Mr. Taft. As I showed you yesterday, there were at least four counties where, in my judgment, there could be no possibility of doubt but that the Roosevelt delegates were legally elected, and any one of those counties would, according to Coiner's own figures, give the Roosevelt delegates control of the convention.

Beverly W. Coiner did well. Let us see what he wanted in the way of patronage. There had been a vacancy in the office of the United States district attorney for the western district of Washington for six or nine months prior to this time. That was one of the pecularities of this campaign. Appointments to fill vacancies were held up until after the Chicago convention, when, as the Texas man said, "The plum tree could be shook." This man Coiner was a candidate for appointment to fill that vacancy. He had a duty to perform. It was a difficult task. He had to overcome the expressed will of the Republicans of the State of Washington, expressed by an overwhelming majority. But he made good in his difficult position; the Chicago convention was held, and Washington delegates lawfully elected were thrown out, and the Coiner delegates put in their places.

In furtherance of this particular thing I am going to read you just a little from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I read from the RECORD of July 23, 1912, page 9491 at the top of the first column. It is from the proceedings of the Senate, showing the nominations for office sent by the President of the United States, and I find this:

United States attorneys: * * * Beverly W. Coiner, of Washington, to be United States attorney for the western district of Washington.

Another "plum tree shook." Another man received his reward for his work in the campaign.

Gentlemen, there was a serious crisis at Chicago. The Republican primaries over the country had been going against the President. The machine was determined that he should be renominated, and the bosses were in desperate straits. Something had to be done, and this man Coiner, through the ingenuity of his fertile brain, coined one of the links in the chain that made possible the stealing of the delegates at Chicago.

Now he has received at the hands of the man for whom he did the work the pay for the job, and the taxpayers of the United States have to foot the bill in the payment of several thousand dollars a year for his salary.

These men at Chicago, the machine politicians and the bosses, saw the handwriting on the wall. They knew that something had to be done. They saw the torn and shattered fragments of their political machine wafted and washed upon the rocks and shoals of disaster and defeat by the maddening waves of an outraged public opinion [applause], and they knew that they had to do something to save their own bacon. Coiner helped to carry out the deal, and Coiner has received his reward.

Patronage, as I have said, is one of the great evils. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] can not distract the attention of the public from the real party who has the stolen goods by his cry of "Stop thief," directed to the officeholders of Texas. I believe that the time will come—God grant that it may come soon—when the man who controls a convention or a nomination by the bribery of patronage will be held in the estimation of the American people to be just as guilty as the man who bribes by the payment of the cold cash. [Applause.] When that time comes the political boss will be standing upon his political St. Helena, looking across the sad waves at disappearing worlds that once were his and whose people formerly bowed down before his throne in humility and submission.

The activity of Federal officeholders on behalf of the renomination of President Taft has been no secret. They were active everywhere, and used their influence everywhere, but in some localities in the South they completely dominated and controlled the situation. The evil of political control by patronage is not confined alone to the officeholders themselves. Many of the political bosses do not occupy public positions. They get their pay not directly from the Federal Treasury but by the control of appointments; they receive their compensation in thousands of devious ways by the favor extended to them through public officials who hold official positions on account of their recommendation. Political machines could not live over night were it not for the wonderful power of patronage. The use of patronage to bring about the renomination of President Taft was known of all men. Its evils smelled to Heaven. I know, the gentleman from Wyoming knows, the Speaker knows, the House knows, the country knows, and God knows that without the power of political patronage the renomination of President Taft at Chicago would have been as impossible as the passing of a camel through a needle's eye.

REGULARITY.

But it is said by the gentleman from Wyoming and others that all these things were regular. Well, there was a regularity in the stealing of delegations in Chicago that was remarkable and amazing. [Applause.]

But regularity of that kind is bound to bring destruction and defeat to any party that permits it to be practiced in its name. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Great Britain in Revolutionary days passed laws against the colonists of America, which laws were perfectly regular, but our forefathers refused to submit to them. Slavery before the war was regular, but Abraham Lincoln issued his Emancipation Proclamation just the same. The money changers in the temple at Jerusalem were regular, but Christ drove them out. Regularity of that kind can have no proper place in the history of our country or in the history of any party. It is a sad example to set before the rising generation. Its effect will be detrimental to the preservation of liberty and of government.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take up the State of Arizona; but before I do that I want to offer just a little more evidence in the Washington case.

WASHINGTON AGAIN.

In the city of Spokane, Wash., is published the Spokesman-Review, one of the leading daily papers of our country, perhaps the paper of largest circulation in the State of Washington. It has been an ardent admirer and supporter of President Taft. It stood with him all the way through until the work at Chicago got so raw that it could not stand for it. It might be ineresting to Members and to the country to know what a paper like that, a friend of Taft, that had always been his supporter, had to say of the proceedings where delegates were stolen in one of the largest cities of the State of Washington.

On May 13, which was just before the State convention, that paper editorially said:

The duty of the State Republican convention on contesting delegations is clear—no hand-picked delegation must be recognized.

The so-called Taft delegation from King County must not be seated.

Here is a delegation of 121 men, headed by ex-Senator John L. Wilson, Richard A. Ballinger, and ex-Senator Piles, selected by a King County Republican committee. No small body of men in any party should be allowed to say who shall be the delegates from any county to determine at the State convention the presidential candidate favored by the State of Washington. The party machinery provides for a primary vote, and such a vote was taken by the properly constituted central committee of the Republican Party in King County. The King County Republicans in that primary plainly expressed their preference for Col. Roosevelt as the presidential nominee, and in the face of such an expression it would be an outrage to seat the Taft hand-picked delegation.

This editorial is all along the same line—a warning to that Republican convention that no Republican could stand for what it seemed was the intention of this man Coiner to do, backed by the State committee. This editorial closes with these words:

The great thinking body of Washington Republicans having declared for Col. Roosevelt, the duty of the Republican convention on Wednesday at Aberdeen is plain—the State must send to the national convention a delegation instructed for Col. Roosevelt.

All talk of compromise emanating from the Taft forces is puerile. There is nothing to compromise. Col. Roosevelt has carried the State; he is entitled to the fruits of his victory.

That same paper in its edition of May 16, 1912, used this language editorially:

The holding of two State Republican conventions in Aberdeen yesterday was not unexpected. The position taken by the State Republican committee left no alternative, and the policy pursued by the Roosevelt delegates will be commended by all fair-minded members of the Republican Party in this State. It should also receive the indorsement of the Republican national committee when it meets in Chicago in June.

Again, in its issue of May 18, editorially it uses this language:

A great responsibility has been placed on the Republican national committee. This committee, when it meets in Chicago next month, will have the very existence of the Republican Party in its hands. To date there are contested delegations to the national convention from 18 States. These delegations include that of Washington, the contest over which the people of the State are familiar, and in its final adjudication are acutely interested.

It is evident from the tenor of the feeling prevalent over the high-handedness of the Washington Republican committee that the mass of Republicans are not going to sit supinely and allow the political burglary of its delegation to be consummated before the Republican national committee. No halfway solution will be satisfactory.

The Taft machine leaders will, of course, be quite satisfied if the two delegations from Washington are seated in the national convention with one-half a vote each.

Now I will read from an editorial in the same paper dated May 19, 1912:

The Spokesman-Review has not changed its opinion respecting President Taft. It believes him to be an honest, capable, conscientious man and a fearless official. His one weak point is in his judgment of men, and some of his advisers have fooled him.

The President is at the parting of the ways, because on the action of the Republican national committee—the headpiece of the party machinery of the Nation—will depend his reelection if he secures a renomination.

The candidate nominated in the Chicago convention must have the backing of the votes of Republicans. Hand-picked delegations by central committees must not be given preference over delegates elected at properly constituted primaries.

ARIZONA.

As I said, the State committee of Arizona met and issued a call for a State convention. Arizona was entitled to six delegates in the national convention, and that call provided that those delegates to the State convention might be selected in any one of three different ways that were named in the call, as follows:

1. Selection by the county committee.

2. The county committee might provide for a primary, at which delegates were to be selected to the county convention, which in turn should select delegates to the State convention.

3. The selection by direct primaries of the delegates to the State convention.

MARICOPA COUNTY.

As the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said, the contest in this State depended mainly upon the contest from Maricopa County. It had been the custom of the Republicans of Maricopa County for 20 years to call primary elections, and this committee had met, according to the call, for the purpose of determining what action they should take.

As the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said, there were first a contest over some proxies. The Taft men objected to proxies, and they had considerable trouble over it, but in the end the proxies were eliminated. The Taft men had their way, and that committee, by a very close vote on a roll call, 22 to 19, decided to hold a primary. They held that primary under that call, and there were cast at that primary 951 votes for Roosevelt and 11 for Taft. The vote in that primary was 80 per cent of the highest vote that had ever been cast in that county at a Republican primary. There were men who were kept away without doubt. I do not deny that. I believe that is true, because the Taft men persuaded men to stay away from the primaries. That is common with that faction in the Republican Party. They do not like primaries, and they know as a rule they get the worst of it when they get into primaries. That is the way the Roosevelt delegates were selected from that county.

Let us see how the Taft delegates were selected. They were picked in a closed room, at a meeting of a minority of the county committee, which was conclusively proven before the committee on credentials at Chicago, to which was presented a statement of 30 members of that committee, constituting a large majority of the committee—a written statement—that none of them had attended that secret meeting and none of them had given a proxy to any other man to attend that meeting. But, notwithstanding that, the State committee of Arizona, controlled by the Taft influences, threw out the Roosevelt delegation and made up a temporary roll—another thing they had never done in that State. They met in advance and made up a temporary roll, and put these Taft delegates from Maricopa on it, and they voted on the organization of the convention and on everything else that came before the convention.

COCHISE COUNTY.

But there was another contested delegation in the Arizona State convention. It came from Cochise County. This county had a membership of 80. In this county the committee decided to select the delegates, which, it will be remembered, was allowable under the call issued by the State committee. At this meeting of Cochise County committee there were 69 members present, either in person or by proxy. Thirty-three Roosevelt members were present in person and 13 Roosevelt members were present by proxy. There were 9 Taft members present in person and 14 Taft members holding proxies.

The Taft men bolted from the committee. This meeting was held on the 15th day of May, being the day that was specifically provided in the State call, that the committee should first meet and decide how it should select its delegates. This call of the State committee provided that if on that day the committee decided that the delegates should be selected by the committee, then the committee should adjourn until the 25th of May, upon which day it should reassemble and select the delegates. The committee of this county decided to pursue that course, and on the 25th day of May they reassembled. At this meeting there were 47 members of the committee present, either in person or by proxy, and they elected Roosevelt delegates to the State convention. The Taft members who had bolted at the previous meeting of the committee selected Taft delegates to the State convention.

ARIZONA STATE CONVENTION.

The State committee, without any authority, as I have before stated in reference to Maricopa County, made up a temporary roll, and they decided that from Cochise County both the Taft delegates and the Roosevelt delegates should be seated and that each delegate should have one-half vote. In the State convention there was a split, the Roosevelt delegates insisting that the action of the State committee in throwing out the delegates elected at the primary in Maricopa County was illegal and that the Roosevelt delegates from that county were entitled to seats in the convention. There were two conventions held in the same hall, at the same time, each having a chairman on the same platform. The Taft faction elected Taft delegates; the Roosevelt faction elected Roosevelt delegates. In the convention, under the State call, there were 96 delegates entitled to seats. If we give to the Roosevelt faction the delegates from Maricopa County—as I believe any fair-minded man must admit we ought—then there were 54 Roosevelt delegates in the convention and 42 Taft delegates. Notwithstanding this state of facts, the national committee, following its usual custom, seated the Taft delegates.

THIRTEENTH INDIANA.

I now come to the thirteenth Indiana, and there is a peculiar condition of affairs. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said that he believes a majority of that convention were Roosevelt delegates and in favor of selecting Roosevelt delegates to the national convention; but he said there was so much noise and disturbance there that the chairman had to conduct the proceedings through a megaphone. The chairman was a Taft man. Both sides agree to that and both sides agree that a majority of the convention were in favor of Roosevelt. Both sides agree there was a good deal of turmoil and disturbance. Let us see. The Roosevelt men lost out because they made so much noise they could not do business. What a reasonable proposition! Men in the majority in a convention bringing in brass bands, yelling and whooping and making noise so that no business could be done, so that the other fellows could win out! That is a reasonable proposition. The gentleman from Wyoming says that he went on that committee, and when he got to the thirteenth Indiana he thought "Here is a place where I can do something for Roosevelt"; but it seems his courage failed him, as usual. The facts are that this chairman, when the motion was made to elect a certain set of Taft delegates, through his megaphone—the band being under his control—put the question and some voted aye and some voted no. He then declared it carried. The Roosevelt men were demanding and urging and calling for a roll call, but the chairman paid no attention to that. The band was making too much noise. The majority of the convention were disturbing him too much. Then that motion was followed by a motion to adjourn, and the chairman put that. He paid no attention to the demands for a roll call made by Roosevelt delegates, and he declared the motion carried and, with his Taft adherents, walked out of the hall. That is what happened in the thirteenth Indiana.

There was a statement presented to the committee by ex-Senator Beveridge, signed by a majority of the delegates to that convention, in which they stated that upon that motion to elect Taft delegates they all voted no. The Roosevelt delegates refused to submit to this arbitrary action, and remained in the hall and elected two delegates and instructed them for Roosevelt.

Mr. Speaker, I might go on with several others, but I am going to make a few observations during the balance of my time and try to close within my limit.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. I have just been discussing with the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN] the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska as to the vote in that county in Arizona—Maricopa. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there were 900 votes cast there for Roosevelt?

Mr. NORRIS. Nine hundred and fifty-one votes for Roosevelt and 11 for Taft.

Mr. COOPER. And what percentage of the Republican vote ever cast in that county was the 951?

Mr. NORRIS. It was over 80 per cent of any Republican primary that had ever been held in the county, and they had been holding them for 20 years.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] took considerable time to explain how prejudiced he was in favor of Roosevelt. Those of us who have served with him here in the House for the last 10 years had to smile when he made that observation. We all know that from the time Mr. Roosevelt, who was then President, promulgated his so-called conservation policy and theories the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been full of criticisms of the worst kind administered to Mr. Roosevelt by the gentleman from Wyoming. If Col. Roosevelt has many such friends as the gentleman from Wyoming, God help him.

The gentleman in an outburst of enthusiasm said yesterday, in speaking of the contests where the Roosevelt men had demanded a little more time, "They had as much time as we did." Think of that from a judge on the bench! Oh, upright judge; oh, unprejudiced chancellor, who, while he is a judge in the case, unintentionally gives expression to a sentiment which strongly indicates that he is a bitterly biased advocate of one side rather than a judge of unbiased temperament.

KING COUNTY AGAIN.

I want to call attention to what the gentleman from Wyoming, in revising his speech, printed in the RECORD regarding the primaries in King County, Wash. In substance, he stated in his address that one of the reasons why the primary in King County should not be recognized was that no one knew for a long time how many votes had been cast. There seemed to be, according to his idea, something mysterious about the primary, and he argued that because of this the primary was therefore fraudulent. He did not even claim that a single solitary fraudulent vote was cast. The statement he printed in the RECORD was from a Taft paper, and which was very bitter against the primary. This primary was held on Saturday. The polls did not close until 8 o'clock at night. The extract from this paper was from its Sunday edition, and we learn that up to the time it went to press, which could have been only a few hours after the polls closed, the returns at that early hour showed not only that the gentleman from Wyoming was wrong in trying to convey the idea that very few people participated, but that he was also wrong in trying to convey the idea that there was anything concealed or mysterious about the primary. If you will take the figures from this very statement in this unfriendly paper, you will find that within these few hours after the closing of the polls nearly half of the precincts had reported and that the public knew what the result was, and if the vote from the precincts that had not reported at that hour compared in number with those that had reported, you must reach the conclusion that even from the statement of this unfriendly paper there were as many votes cast as I have claimed.

CONCLUSION.

I have now gone over the contests involving the seats of 46 delegates in the national convention at Chicago. I have not, however, exhausted the subject. There are a few other cases as plain as these that I have gone over. Then there are between 20 and 30 cases not as plain, but in which I am firmly convinced and believe any unbiased mind, upon investigation, would be convinced that the vast preponderance of the evidence is in favor of the Roosevelt delegates. But I will not weary the House with further details. It was only necessary to show that 19 Taft delegates were illegally seated in order to demonstrate that his pretended title to this alleged nomination is absolutely null and void. I have already gone much further than that. It logically follows, therefore, that no Republican is under any party obligations whatever to support Mr. Taft for President.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that a majority of the delegates to Chicago were in favor of the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt, and I believe that it was a majority of the delegates that afterwards met in Orchestra Hall and placed him in nomination, and that he is the only legal and lawful nominee of the Republican Party to-day. I shall print in the RECORD a copy of the resolution that was adopted placing him in nomination.

I have not sought this contest, Mr. Speaker. I would have been very glad to have avoided this responsibility or to have had it placed on other shoulders than my own. I had no disposition to air this controversy, and I regret it as much as any man in the House that the gentleman from Wyoming saw fit to open it up. As he said, he was urged to do so by others. There is no doubt he was selected to place before the country the Taft side of the proposition; and, considering the case that he has, he did remarkably well. I would not have opened up this sore; but since it was opened up I was in favor of cleaning it out. I realize that what I have said and the course I have taken will bring down upon my head a great deal of criticism and censure.

It has been an unpleasant task for me for the last two or three years in this House to often be arrayed against the leaders of my own party. I have been opposed to political machines, to boss control, and to caucus rule, and it seemed to me it was my duty to proclaim what I believed to be right and to expose what I believed to be wrong just as quick when I find it in my party as though I found it in some other party. I want to say it has been sometimes a discouraging proposition. I know that I have lost many friendships, both on the floor of the House and in my State, but I would rather go down to defeat and into oblivion than to ride forever on the wave of victory with a guilty consciousness of having even by my silence given approval to what happened in Chicago, when in my heart I honestly believe it to be one of the worst political highway robberies that has ever been committed in this country. [Applause.] I want to close by expressing my sentiments and my feelings by using the words of the immortal Lincoln:

> I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true. I am not bound to succeed, but I am bound to live up to what light I have. I must stand with anybody who stands right, stand with him while he is right and part from him when he goes wrong.

[Loud applause.]

As stated in my remarks, I file herewith, to be printed in the RECORD, the resolution nominating Mr. Roosevelt as the Republican candidate for President, passed at the Orchestra Hall meeting in Chicago. Said resolution is as follows:

> We, delegates and alternates to the Republican national convention, representing a clear majority of the voters of the Republican Party in the Nation, and representing a clear majority of the delegates and alternates legally elected to the convention, in meeting assembled, make the following declaration:

DEEM IT DUTY TO ACT.

We were delegated by a majority of the Republican voters of our respective districts and States to nominate Theodore Roosevelt in the Republican convention as the candidate of our party for President and thereby carry out the will of the voters as expressed at the primaries. We have earnestly and conscientiously striven to execute the commission intrusted to us by the party voters.

For five days we have been denied justice in the national convention. This result has been accomplished by the action of the now defunct national committee in placing upon the preliminary roll of the convention and thereby seating upon the floor of the convention a sufficient number of fraudulently elected delegates to control the proceedings of the convention. These fraudulent delegates have by concerted action with one another put themselves upon the permanent roll, where they constitute an influence sufficient to control the convention and defeat the will of the party as expressed at the primaries.

We have exhausted every known method to head off this conspiracy and to prevent this fraud upon the popular will, but without success.

"WE'RE DENIED JUSTICE."

We were sent to this convention bearing the most specific instructions to place Theodore Roosevelt in nomination as the candidate of our party for President, and we therefore deem it to be our duty to carry out those instructions in the only practical and feasible way remaining open to us: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, representing the majority of the voters of the Republican Party and of the delegates and alternates legally elected to the national Republican convention, in compliance with our instructions from the party voters, hereby nominate Theodore Roosevelt as the candidate of our party for the office of President of the United States; and we call upon him to accept such nomination in compliance with the will of the party voters; and be it further

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the Chair to forthwith notify Col. Roosevelt of the action here taken, and request him to appear before us in this hall as soon as convenient.

I ask to have printed also in the RECORD a statement of several of the contest cases which I have discussed, prepared by Hon. H. E. Sackett, of Nebraska, who was a member of the committee on credentials at the Chicago convention, as follows:

THE ARIZONA CONTEST.

The Arizona contest turns on the outcome of the election held in Maricopa and Cochise Counties.

The State committee of Arizona issued a call for the State convention to be held in Tucson on June 3, 1912, for the purpose of selecting six delegates to the Republican national convention at Chicago.

This call provided three methods of choosing county delegates to the convention:

First. The selection by the county committee.

Second. The county committee might provide for a primary, at which delegates were to be selected before the county convention, which in turn should select delegates to the State convention.

Third. The selection by direct primaries of the delegates to the State convention.

The choice of methods was left with each county for itself, the State call providing that the county committees should meet on May 15, and severally to determine what method they should adopt; if by appointment by a committee, appointment would be made at a meeting of the committee to be held on the 25th of May; if the selection was to be by primaries, the primaries would be held on the 25th of May.

AN OLD RULE.

It has been the custom and rule for 20 years of the Republicans of Maricopa County to select their delegates by primaries. On the 15th of May the county committee duly and the credentials committee duly and legally appointed threw out all proxies offered by both sides, for the reason that some were disputed, others conflicting, and one had gotten into the hands of a person to whom it was not directed. The committee meeting was therefore confined to the committeemen actually present, and representing a large majority of the total membership of the committee. This committee by a vote of 20 to 19 ordered primaries to be held, appointed a committee to arrange therefor; the votes were all by roll call, and all of the minority voted and two members of the committee favorable to President Taft joined with the Roosevelt forces in voting for the primaries.

The primary election thus ordered was conducted with the greatest care and regularity and resulted in a vote of 951 for Roosevelt and 11 for Taft. The total vote cast was 80 per cent of the maximum vote ever cast in Maricopa County at a Republican primary election and resulted in the election of 20 delegates to the State convention instructed for Roosevelt by the vote above stated.

PICKED IN CLOSED ROOM.

The alleged Taft delegates from Maricopa County were picked in a closed room at a meeting of a minority of the county committee, which was conclusively proven before the credentials committee at Chicago, to whom there was presented a signed statement of 30 members of the county committee of Maricopa County, a strong majority of that committee, that they did not attend the so-called committee meeting that selected the alleged Taft delegates either in person or by proxy.

In Cochise County the facts as presented were as follows: A county committee met on the 15th of May, 69 members present out of a total membership of 80 either in person or by proxy. Of this number 33 Roosevelt members were present in person and 13 Roosevelt members were present by proxy. There were 9 Taft members present in person and 14 Taft members present by proxy.

The chairman and secretary, both Taft men, after the meeting had been legally opened, bolted, taking with them 7 Taft committeemen and 14 proxies. The remaining committeemen, constituting a majority of the committee, went on with the meeting in regular order, elected a chairman and secretary and resolved that the delegates to be selected to the State convention at a meeting to be held on the 25th of May, be elected as provided in method No. 1, as authorized by the call of the State committee.

At a meeting held on the 25th of May 47 members of the county committee were present in person or by proxy and constituted more than a majority of the membership of the committee and unanimously elected 16 Roosevelt delegates to the State convention. The Taft minority committeemen who bolted the first meeting did not attend the second meeting of the committee.

DOMINATED BY TAFT MEN.

We now come to the State convention of Arizona, at which the delegates to the Republican national convention were selected. The executive committee of the State central committee was completely dominated by Taft men, and shortly before the State convention this executive committee gave notice that it would meet on the 1st of June (the State convention to meet on the 3d of June); that credentials should be filed with it, and it would determine contests for the purpose of preparing a roll call for use in effecting a temporary organization of the State convention.

The evidence shows that the action on the part of the committee was unprecedented and wholly beyond the authority and power of the committee, either by law, custom, or rule of the State committee.

The Roosevelt delegates to the State convention, of course, refused to submit the question of the regularity and fact of their selection to a body wholly without authority to act in the matter. It was also proven that the State committee of Arizona had never before assumed such power.

When the chairman of the State committee called the convention to order on June 3 he proceeded to read a roll of those whom the State committee, without authority, had determined should take part in the temporary organization, and arbitrarily disqualified the Roosevelt delegates elected in the primaries from Maricopa County and seated the Taft delegates, who had been appointed by a minority of the Maricopa County committee, and gave a half vote each to the Roosevelt and Taft delegates from Cochise County, who had been elected in the manner herein set forth, and thus attempted to secure control of the State convention.

DELEGATION IS SPLIT.

The Roosevelt delegates naturally refused to submit to this illegal action, and the State convention split in two factions, each faction holding conventions simultaneously in the same hall, with their presiding officers on the same platform. The total membership in the State convention was 96, of which 49 was a majority.

There were present 54 delegates favoring Col. Roosevelt who were regularly and legally elected, constituting a majority of the State convention, who elected to the national convention 6 Roosevelt delegates who, upon a contest by the Taft forces, were unseated by the national committee and the credentials committee and Taft delegates seated in their stead and placed upon the temporary roll of the national convention.

Notwithstanding these facts which were presented to the national committee and also to the credentials committee, the evidence was ignored and the Taft delegates seated in the convention.

THE FACTS IN CALIFORNIA CASE.

On December 12, 1911, the Republican national committee issued a call for the Republican national convention to be held at Chicago, Ill., June 18, 1912.

In January, 1912, the Legislature of the State of California passed a direct primary law which, in substance, provides, among other things, that delegates to the national convention of political parties should all be elected at large. This law was unanimously passed by both branches of the legislature and was accepted by all parties; all of the candidates ran under the provisions of this law, and all votes were cast in accordance therewith. The Taft faction accepted its provisions and made no objection to entering into the contest under this law. Neither did the Taft people make any attempt to conduct a primary in any other manner, and made no protest against the law.

The undisputed evidence before the credentials committee shows that the law for the election of all the delegates to the national convention, at large, was expressly accepted in writing by the Taft organization.

The primary was held on the date specified in the call and strictly according to the law, and resulted in the election of all of the Roosevelt delegates, 26 in number, by majorities averaging over 76,000, and Taft newspapers and Taft candidates accepted the results of this election.

Certificates of election were issued to the Roosevelt delegates by the secretary of state, and were the only certificates issued to or presented to any delegates from California.

After the primary election was held and the certificates of election issued the Roosevelt delegates, by the proper authority and without objection by the Taft representatives, a contest was filed against 2 of the 26 delegates, before the national committee, which committee unseated 2 Roosevelt delegates, and placed in their stead 2 Taft delegates (who resided in the city of San Francisco, of which the fourth congressional district is a part, the boundaries of the fourth congressional district being uncertain, overlapping another district), on the pretext that the Taft delegates had received a majority of the votes in that district.

The evidence before the credentials committee disclosed that this congressional district in question was a new district which cut through the middle of 14 precincts of an old district. In these 14 precincts 1,685 Republican votes were cast, the 3 Roosevelt candidates for delegates, who resided in this district, received 701 votes, and the highest vote received by any 1 of the 3 Taft candidates was 685 votes, giving in these precincts a majority of 16 votes to the Roosevelt delegates.

Affidavits from the registrar of votes and the secretary of state of California were presented before the credentials committee, stating that it was impossible to determine which delegate received a majority of the votes cast within the boundaries of the fourth district, because of the overlapping of the precincts.

In the vote in the whole city of San Francisco, which comprises the fourth and fifth congressional districts, the Roosevelt candidates received an average of 21,500 and the Taft candidates 18,250.

Notwithstanding the facts as thus presented, the national committee arrogated unto itself the power to nullify the law enacted by the California Legislature, and to set aside the decision of the voters of the State of California under said law by an expressed majority of over 76,000.

The California law as enacted by the legislature was prepared before the call of the national committee was issued, and was passed before an official copy of that call was received in California. The primary law of the State of California regularly enacted by its legally authorized officers and approved by the people of California was deliberately set aside without a scintilla of evidence or authority of law. If such action is permitted to stand it will operate as a nullification of the right of the people by direct vote to determine party nomination by the vote of party members.

THE TEXAS CASE.

The law of the State of Texas relating to elections and conventions as applied to the selection of delegates to national conventions provides, in substance, that "any political party desiring to elect delegates to a national convention shall hold a State convention at such place as may be designated by the State executive committee of said party on the fourth Tuesday of May, 1908, and every four years thereafter. Said convention shall be comprised of delegates duly elected by the voters of said political party in the several counties of the State at primary conventions to be held on the first Saturday in May, 1908, and every four years thereafter."

The evidence introduced before the credentials committee was that the State executive committee met on March 28, 1912, and in compliance with the State law issued a call providing for the holding of primary elections and conventions on the 4th day of the following May, to elect delegates to county conventions, to be held on the 17th of May, the county conventions to elect delegates to the State and congressional conventions. The State convention, to be held at Fort Worth on May 28, to elect delegates to the national convention at Chicago. Primary elections and conventions were held on May 4, as specified by law, and delegates elected to the county conventions. The county conventions were held on May 17, and, in accordance with the call, elected delegates to the State and congressional conventions. Notice of these elections and conventions was given as required by law.

The Republican State committee convened on May 27, one day before the State convention, as required in the call, to hear and pass upon contests and to prepare the temporary roll of the convention. Credentials of delegates claiming seats in the State convention were all submitted to the committee from 208 of the 249 counties in the State. (The original credentials were introduced before the credentials committee of the national convention and were shown to be properly attested and sworn to by the chairmen and secretaries of the various county conventions.) The 41 counties which were not represented were those not organized under the State law or not organized under the rules of the State executive committee or failed to present credentials properly attested. Out of the 249 counties contests were shown to have been made in only 17 counties.

The State committee, on which were both Taft and Roosevelt men, by a unanimous vote referred these contests to four subcommittees, each composed of both Roosevelt and Taft representatives, and assigned for hearing to three of said subcommittees four counties each, and to the other five counties, and then took an adjournment for three hours to permit these committees to hear the contests. The subcommittees, after hearing the evidence in the contests, reported in due course to the State committee. The report of three of said committees was unanimous, and in the other one a Taft member presented a minority report differing from the finding of the majority of said committees on only two counties. The reports of these committees were signed by the members of the subcommittees and were attested by the secretary of the State committee.

Of the 17 contests considered by the subcommittees, the entire Taft delegations were seated from four counties and one-half of the Taft delegation and one-half of the Roosevelt delegations from four counties and the Roosevelt delegates from nine counties. The State committee, by a vote of 28 to 2, accepted the regular credentials filed with said committee and adopted a temporary roll call, as provided by the State committee, 3 of the 28 constituting the majority being Taft men. Two members of the State committee gave notice that they would present to the State convention a minority report. No evidence was introduced by either side before the credentials committee of the national convention that said minority report was ever presented to the State convention. The State convention, in accordance with the call, convened at the Savoy Theater in the city of Fort Worth at the time and place designated therein for the holding of the convention. The report of the majority of the State executive committee, which included the three Taft members, was unanimously adopted by the convention on a roll call.

Out of 249 counties in the State, 27 were instructed for President Taft; 12 of these counties were represented and took part in the convention. The State convention, thus organized, elected delegates to the national convention instructed for Roosevelt by a vote of 162⅔ to 13⅓. It might be of interest to here state that an uncontested district delegate and a Taft delegate was present before the credentials committee and made a statement in support of the facts presented by the Roosevelt delegates. It was further established before the committee on credentials that all of the proceedings leading up to the State convention and the selection of the delegates to the national convention which were instructed for Roosevelt were strictly in accordance with the State laws of Texas and the call for the convention.

The only evidence introduced on behalf of the Taft delegates was that some of the Taft delegates to the State convention held a meeting in a room in Fort Worth other than the place designated in the call; that but a small minority of the counties of the State were represented—it should be remembered that 13 of the 27 counties instructed for President Taft were present and took part in the regular convention at which the Roosevelt delegates were elected. It was claimed that the reason for the meeting was because they did not agree with the action of the State committee, as it was controlled by the national committeeman from that State and that he had used his influence for Roosevelt. It did not appear that any notice of any kind of the time or place of this meeting was ever given or published, credentials filed, or roll call of the counties presented. It was at this meeting that the delegates for President Taft to the national convention were elected and on the proceedings and actions of which they asserted their rights to seats in the national convention. It was upon the evidence as herein stated that a majority report of the credentials committee at Chicago to seat the Taft delegates at large was adopted.

In the matter of the district contests from Texas the facts were very brief and as presented before the credentials committee are substantially as follows:

The seventh congressional district comprises eight countries; six of these counties were carried by Roosevelt and two for Taft. At the meeting of the congressional executive committee the chairman refused to recognize four Roosevelt members of said committee. No reason was given for his action. These members whom he refused to recognize had been elected as original members of the committee or appointed to fill vacancies, as provided by law. Regardless of the action of the chairman, the delegates from six out of the eight counties held a convention and elected Roosevelt delegates to the national convention. The Roosevelt delegates had a clear majority. They were unseated by the credentials committee.

The fifth district is composed of five counties. There were five members of the congressional committee, three of whom were Taft men. The committee thus constituted seated the Roosevelt delegates from three counties at the district convention. The delegates who were unseated from two of these counties organized a separate convention and elected Taft delegates. One of the counties regularly instructed for Taft took part in the regular convention which elected the Roosevelt delegates. The national committee and credentials committee unseated the two Roosevelt delegates from this district.

The eighth district comprises nine counties. Six of the nine were carried for Roosevelt. Two of the counties which were for Taft bolted the regular convention and held a separate convention, electing Taft delegates. The regular convention, which was legally called and held according to call, and in which seven counties participated, elected Roosevelt delegates. Upon this evidence the national committee and credentials committee unseated the Roosevelt delegates and seated the Taft delegates.

The fourth district is composed of five counties. At a meeting of the congressional committee on May 17, 1912, there were two contests presented by delegations from two precincts, which had been refused admission to the county convention of their respective counties. The congressional committee refused to sustain their contest. The convention was then organized, and four out of five counties participated. Roosevelt delegates were elected.

At another time and place, subsequent to the regular convention as above set forth, the one county which did not take part in the regular convention, together with the delegates from the two precincts which were denied admission on their contest to the regular convention, held a convention and elected Taft delegates. It did not appear that any of the Taft delegates to the regular county convention bolted or made any objection at the time the regular convention was held; but the credentials committee, following its usual custom, in the face of the evidence, seated the Taft delegates.

In the ninth district the regular congressional chairman of the district called the convention in the regular way, and a majority of the delegates in the district took part in the convention and was recognized by the executive committee of the district as regular. Roosevelt delegates were elected at this convention. Another convention was called by a chairman of one of the counties in the district, who had no authority for his act. Taft delegates were elected. Regardless of such gross irregularity and in the face of such flimsy pretext, the credentials committee seated the Taft delegates.

The tenth district comprises 8 counties. The congressional convention was regularly called, was participated in by all counties in the district. A Taft man, member of the State committee, took part. Roosevelt delegates were elected. The delegates from 2½ counties bolted and held a convention. The Taft delegates elected at this latter convention were seated by the credentials committee.

There are 14 counties in the fourteenth district. The congressional executive committee, 1 from each county, had only 1 contest brought before it. This was from Bear County. Both the Roosevelt and Taft delegates were seated. Each delegate had one-half vote. The Taft delegation from this county, together with the delegates from 2 other counties of the 14, bolted the regular convention and elected Taft delegates. The other 11½ counties held a convention under the call of the congressional committee and at the time and place designated held the regular convention. Roosevelt delegates were elected. On the evidence thus presented the credentials committee, with due deliberation but with customary certainty, seated the Taft delegates. As a sidelight on the deliberations of the committee on the Texas case, we consider the following incident both of interest and instructive. The regular member of the committee from New York did not sit on the committee during the presentation of the evidence but was represented by another member from his State as his proxy, who after hearing the evidence signified his intention of voting to seat the Roosevelt delegates in the convention. This unusual condition of mind was discovered by the Taft leaders in the committee and the original member of the committee hurriedly called, and without having heard the evidence promptly voted to seat the Taft delegates.

FIFTH DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

The counties in the fifth district held conventions to select delegates to the district convention, which selected 2 delegates to the national convention. The contest hinged upon the methods used in the selection of county delegates to the district convention. The Roosevelt representatives showed that they had been kept out of the convention halls by police and prevented from participating in the deliberations of the conventions.

Evidence also was produced that they had a majority of the delegates to these conventions in more than a majority of the counties representing a majority of the delegates to the district convention.

In Pulaski County, the largest in the State, the Roosevelt forces were in the majority, but the Taft representatives obtained possession of the hall and refused admittance to the Roosevelt delegates, organized the county convention, and elected Taft delegates to the district convention.

The Taft men, by seating the Taft delegation from Pulaski County, gained control of the district convention and elected Taft delegates to the national convention. The Roosevelt men held a convention, including the Pulaski County delegation, which had been by force prevented from taking part in the county convention, and elected delegates to the national convention.

The Roosevelt organization gave the required legal notice for the holding of the convention, by publishing the regular call therefor, copies were exhibited to the committee, but the Taft delegates were seated in the convention by the credentials committee.

ELEVENTH DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY.

The regularity of the proceedings leading up to the holding of the district convention was not questioned by the Taft representatives. It was shown that all steps had been taken as required by the call and the law.

The district convention was controlled by the Roosevelt men, and a credentials committee of five was appointed by the chairman. Contests were filed against 123 delegates, which were passed upon by the committee.

The convention when organized was in the complete control of the Roosevelt men by a large majority, and delegates to the national convention were elected for Roosevelt.

The Taft men claimed that the credentials committee was irregularly organized from each county in the district. This, however, did not appear to have been the custom in past conventions, the chairman of the committee usually appointing the credentials committee. The Taft delegates, who were in the minority, had a bolting convention and chose Taft delegates.

The committee seated one Taft and one Roosevelt delegate in the convention. From the evidence submitted both Roosevelt men should have been seated. In the seventh and eighth districts of Kentucky the evidence in support of the Roosevelt delegates was equally as cogent and convincing as that of the eleventh district, but the Taft delegates were seated by the credentials committee.

THIRD DISTRICT OF OKLAHOMA.

This district is composed of 19 counties. It was admitted by the Taft men that the chairman of the committee, who was for Roosevelt, has been deposed and that six other Roosevelt men had been barred because the Taft men did not consider their proxies acceptable.

This action resulted in two conventions held at Tulsa. Sixteen of the nineteen counties were represented by regular delegates in the Roosevelt convention and elected Roosevelt delegates to the national convention. The committee seated the Taft delegates.

THIRTEENTH DISTRICT OF INDIANA.

In the Indiana thirteenth district contest the facts, as related before the committee, established that the convention was regularly called, and was held at Warsaw, Ind., on April 2, 1912, the date and place specified in the call. That Fred Woodward, district chairman, called the convention to order; that two candidates for permanent chairman were placed in nomination. A. C. Graham was the Taft candidate and Aaron Jones was the Roosevelt candidate.

It was shown that in taking the vote there was a great deal of confusion. Mr. Graham was declared elected by one-half of one vote and took the chair. A credentials committee was selected and reported to the convention, overruling the six contests filed by the Taft adherents and the two filed by the Roosevelt people.

The convention then proceeded to the selection of two delegates to the national convention. Nominations were made by both the Taft and Roosevelt forces. The chairman then proceeded to call for a viva voce vote on these two sets of candidates, those for the Taft delegates voting "aye," and the Roosevelt delegates "no." Members of the convention protested against this manner of procedure and demanded a roll call, but the chairman refused their request and declared that the "aye" vote carried and the Taft delegates elected.

A motion to adjourn was made, which the chairman declared carried, while the protest against the unusual manner of electing delegates was being made by the Roosevelt representatives. The Roosevelt delegates, after this action of the chairman as above stated, continued in the meeting and elected two Roosevelt delegates, and in the contest before the credentials committee Senator Beveridge produced in evidence the signed statement of a majority of the delegates to the district convention that on the motion to elect delegates, which the chairman had declared carried by the Taft delegates, they had voted for the Roosevelt delegates. This evidence was not controverted by the Taft representatives before the committee, but regardless of the evidence of a majority of the delegates to the district convention the credentials committee seated the Taft delegates.

THE WASHINGTON CASE.

February 29, 1912, the Republican State committee of Washington issued a call for the State convention to be held on May 15 in the city of Aberdeen, at which time all delegates to the national convention were chosen. The district delegates by the delegation from each district sitting separately, and the delegates at large by the entire convention as a whole. The call recommended the selection of delegates to both State and county conventions.

The State committee is composed of 39 members, 1 from each of the 39 counties of the State. A majority of this committee were adherents of President Taft. In a majority of the 39 counties, county conventions were called to elect delegates to the State convention. In King County, in which is located the city of Seattle; Pierce County, in which is situated the city of Tacoma; and Spokane County the county committees elected to hold primary elections in their respective counties. The call provided for delegates to the State convention to the number of 668. There were 263 uncontested delegates to the State convention favorable to Roosevelt and 97 uncontested delegates favorable to President Taft.

Twelve counties had contests, involving 304 delegates. Of this number 121 delegates were from King County, 69 from the counties of Pierce and Clallam. The remaining 114 contested delegates were from 9 other counties.

The importance of getting the delegation from King County by either side in the contest will be understood when it is realized that the number of delegates from this county added to the uncontested Roosevelt strength would give the Roosevelt people a substantial majority of the State convention.

It is therefore important that the facts and evidence relating to the contest of King County should be given in detail. The county committee of King County numbered about 250 members, to which had been added 151 members from as many new precincts which had been created by the municipal authorities of the city of Seattle.

On April 13, 1912, the county committee met for the purpose of deciding the manner of electing delegates to the county convention. At this meeting the committee passed a resolution providing for the holding of a primary election to elect delegates to the county convention to be held on April 27. In this same meeting the county committee discharged from further service a subcommittee of 22 men which had been appointed to act as an examining committee to facilitate the conduct of the campaign of 1910, which when closed terminated the duties of this subcommittee. Notice of the primary was duly published and the primary held, at which 6,900 Republican votes were cast, of which the Roosevelt representatives received 6,400 and the Taft representatives 500. Roosevelt delegates were then elected to attend the State convention.

After the meeting of the county convention above mentioned, at which primaries were ordered, 14 Taft men, members of the old subcommittee of 22, which had been discharged by the county committee without notice to the other members of the committee, met and selected 121 men as Taft delegates to the State convention. Among this number thus selected was ex-Secretary R. A. Ballinger. The Taft men controlled the State committee of 39 members by a vote of 25 to 14.

It appears from the evidence that at prior State conventions the convention itself had always arranged and provided for the hearing of contests. In this particular instance, the State committee devised a different method, and its chairman, a Mr. Coiner, on May 2 called a meeting of the State committee at Aberdeen to be held on May 14, the day preceding the State convention, for the purpose of passing upon the credentials of delegates to the State convention. This call so issued also provided that this method of passing upon credentials by the committee was pursuant to the rules and custom of the national organization of the Republican Party, but was not pursuant to the custom of the Republican organization of the State of Washington.

An examination of the statutes of the State of Washington disclosed that the committee is given power to call the convention, but nowhere does it provide that said committee shall have the power to organize the convention. This action on the part of the State committee was a plain usurpation of the rights of the convention. It was alleged by the Roosevelt representatives, and evidence presented to substantiate the allegation, that on the night before the meeting of the State committee on the 14th, 21 of the 39 State committeemen met in a caucus and resolved to vote as a unit for the seating of a sufficient number of Taft delegates to control that State convention.

TAFT MEN SEATED.

At the meeting of the State committee on the 14th all contests were decided in favor of the Taft people, including King County, except the two counties of Pierce and Clallam, representing 69 delegates, which were decided for the Roosevelt people. At this meeting, on the 14th, it was shown that the committee, without any precedent therefor, adopted a set of rules placing the temporary organization of the convention in the hands of the chairman of the State committee, and further provided that no delegate should be admitted to the State convention without a ticket signed by the chairman of the State committee. Evidence was submitted that no such requirement for delegates to have tickets had ever been made in any previous convention in the State of Washington. These rules were not printed or given out so that the Roosevelt members of the committee could secure or see them.

It further appears that on the 14th, efforts were put forth by the opposing forces to reach a harmonious understanding as to the organization of the convention, and for the disposing of the contests by the convention. A committee was appointed by each side to take up and carry on the negotiations along this line, with the result that on the 15th an understanding was reached for the disposition by the convention of certain of the contests where the merits were plain, and where doubt existed, half of the delegation should be given to each faction. In order to secure further time for these committees to submit to the convention their agreement for ratification, it was agreed by mutual consent that the time for the meeting of the convention would be postponed from 10 o'clock a. m., to 1 o'clock p. m. of the same day.

Evidence further shows that shortly after 10 o'clock on the morning of the 15th, the Roosevelt delegates discovered that, regardless of the agreement to postpone the meeting hour of the convention to 1 o'clock, the Taft delegates had entered the hall and were acting as a convention. The Roosevelt delegates then went to the hall. None of them had been given tickets of admission, nor had they been notified where tickets could be obtained, and few, if any, knew of the unusual rule providing for delegates to have tickets. When they arrived at the convention hall they found the doors of the hall locked, except the main door, which was guarded by a policeman. The windows were barred and the fire escapes removed. The Roosevelt delegates offered their credentials at the main entrance, but were refused by those in charge because they had no tickets. Neither were they informed as to where tickets could be obtained. They then persisted in an attempt to be admitted to the hall, but were forcibly prevented by the police and those in charge of the hall, and were ordered back in the street.

The delegates representing Roosevelt after having been denied admission to the convention, as above related, met in another hall and organized a convention, and elected Roosevelt delegates to the national convention.

It is of interest at this point to relate the facts pertaining to contests in two other counties of the State, namely, Ascotin and Chelan. In the first mentioned county the facts related show that the precinct committeemen had the authority through the county organization to call conventions and to elect delegates for the purpose of electing delegates to the State convention, or, they could themselves elect the delegates. There are 11 precincts in Ascotin County, 3 of the 11 precinct committeemen met without notice, and with other men who possessed no credentials or authority of any kind, named the Taft delegates to the State convention.

The citizens and electorate of this county, pursuant to a call, held a convention and elected Roosevelt delegates to the State convention. In the county of Chelan the county convention met in regular manner and order. It was made up of both Taft and Roosevelt delegates. A Roosevelt man was elected chairman of the temporary organization by a vote of 31 to 22. A committee on credentials was appointed to pass on the three precinct contests. The convention adjourned until 1 o'clock p. m. of the same day to give the committee time to hear a report of these contests. In all the proceedings, up to and including the adjournment, the Taft men took part. After the adjournment and before the reconvening of the convention at 1 o'clock the Taft men, constituting a minority of the committee, met in another hall and organized and elected Taft delegates to the State convention.

ROOSEVELT MEN OUSTED.

At 1 o'clock of the same day, as provided in the adjournment, the regular organization reconvened and in a regular manner elected Roosevelt delegates to the State convention. The State committee, controlled by a majority of Taft adherents, as set forth herein, threw out the Roosevelt delegates in both these counties.

In the State convention held by the Taft people in the hall where the meeting was called, after the exclusion of the Roosevelt delegates as hereinbefore set forth, there were present 401 men, of whom but 97 were uncontested delegates, and 304 contested delegates. In these contested delegates were included the 69 Taft delegates from Pierce and Clallam Counties which had been unseated by the State committee in its session the day before the convention. There were also included in these 304 contested delegates the 121 delegates selected by the Taft members on the subcommittee of King County, as hereinbefore related, and which had no legal claim whatever to a seat in any convention.

In the convention of the Roosevelt delegates held after being prevented from entering the convention, as herein stated, there were present 567 men, of whom 263 were uncontested delegates and the 69 delegates from Pierce and Clallum Counties whose credentials had been approved by the State committee; and there were also present the 121 delegates from King County who had been selected at a public primary by a majority of 6,400 votes, as herein stated. These 567 delegates out of the 668 of which the State convention was composed elected the Roosevelt delegates to the national convention. The national committee and the credentials committee seated the entire Taft delegation from the State of Washington.

I file herewith also, to be printed in the RECORD, a statement covering the contest cases from the State of Washington. This statement was prepared by the Hon. MILES POINDEXTER, United States Senator from that State:

STATEMENT OF ESSENTIAL FACTS AS TO THE CHOICE OF REPUBLICAN DELEGATES FROM THE STATE OF WASHINGTON TO THE CHICAGO CONVENTION, JUNE 18, 1912.

[By Hon. MILES POINDEXTER, United States Senator from the State of Washington.]

This delegation was to be chosen by a State Republican convention called to meet in the city of Aberdeen, Wash., May 15, 1912. The authorized membership of this convention was 668. Of this number there were 264 Roosevelt delegates uncontested. In addition to these there were authorized Roosevelt delegates entitled to sit in the convention against whom unfounded contests were instituted by the Taft faction, as follows:

"Pierce County, 61; Clallam County, 8; Chelan County, 10; King County, 121; Mason County, 8."

This gave Roosevelt 472 out of the 668 delegates. In addition to this there were Roosevelt delegates duly chosen from several other counties against whom unfounded contests were instituted by the Taft faction, which would have made his majority in the convention much larger. But for the purposes of brevity we will consider the facts in the above specially mentioned cases only.

The State committee was presided over by B. W. Coiner, an active candidate for appointment by Mr. Taft as district attorney for the western district of Washington. Cooperating with him was Mr. S. A. Perkins, of Takoma, proprietor of several newspapers in western Washington and nominally a member of the national committee from the State of Washington. Incidentally it may be said that the State committee consists of 39 members, 1 from each of the 39 counties of the State; that Mr. Perkins was chosen national committeeman at a meeting at which the sole attendants were 3 members of this committee of 39, namely; Mr. B. W. Coiner, of Pierce County; W. W. Hopkins, of Thurston County; Richard Condon, of Kitsap County. In addition to these Mr. B. W. Coiner claimed to hold a proxy from A. D. Sloan, of Yakima County.

There were no other members nor proxies present, and Mr. Perkins's sole claim to his position as national committeeman from the State of Washington rests upon this meeting, which manifestly was without any authority whatever to act for the State committee of Washington which, under the rules, was entitled to select the national committeeman. Mr. S. A. Perkins had visited the city of Washington during the past winter and had assured Mr. McKinley, manager of the Taft campaign and Mr. Taft himself that a Taft delegation would be sent from the State of Washington. There is indubitable evidence that instructions and suggestions as to manner of proceeding were given to the State committee of Washington by the Taft national campaign committee. Cooperating with Mr. Perkins and Mr. Coiner in their illegal proceedings were Messrs. W. T. Dovell and Howard Cosgrove, attorneys, of Seattle; Mr. Ed. Benn, of Aberdeen; and Mr. T. P. Fisk.

The plan of these men was, after having instituted flimsy and unfounded contests against the Roosevelt delegations from the several counties, that the State committee which they controlled should meet at Aberdeen preceding the date fixed for the State convention and should assume the authority, for which there was no precedent in the State, to pass upon the credentials of delegates to the State convention and make out a temporary roll, to eliminate a sufficient number of Roosevelt delegates to give Taft control of the convention, to seize the convention hall and hold it by force, and to admit to it none except such delegates and visitors as they approved.

Acting in pursuance of this plan, the State committee met at Aberdeen preceding the convention and adopted a set of rules for its guidance, including the control of the State convention, the latter a matter which the State committee had no authority under party practice in the State to do. There is ample evidence, which it is not necessary or essential to go into at this point, that the plan to capture by any means that might be necessary the delegation from the State of Washington had been carefully agreed upon beforehand by the leaders named above and others cooperating with them, and that they would carry it out was thoroughly understood and was stated by a number of prominent Taft men in the State preceding the meeting of the State convention.

After adopting the rules aforesaid, an agreement was made between 21 members of the State committee to vote as a unit on every question as to credentials of delegates to the State convention. Thereupon this "cabal" proceeded to go through the form of deciding the contests which had been previously instituted in pursuance of the plan named above and to decide a sufficient number of them in favor of the Taft contestants to give them control of the convention by a narrow margin. They then, with the assistance of Benn and his local influence in the city of Aberdeen, placed 15 policemen in charge of the convention hall the night before the day fixed for the meeting of the convention, barred the windows and other entrances to the hall except the one guarded by the police, arranged the fire hose as an additional means, to be used, if necessary, in addition to the police in preventing by force the entrance into the convention hall of any delegates or other persons not approved by the "cabal" of the State committee under the plan stated above. Instructions were given to the doorkeepers to admit no one into the hall not bearing a card signed by B. W. Coiner, chairman of the committee. Such proceedings were unheard of in the State of Washington, and undoubtedly were a part of the advice given to the conspirators named above by the managers of the Taft national committee.

On the morning of the 15th, delegations arriving in Aberdeen for the convention, even those whose credentials had been approved by the State committee and who were entitled to cards of admission under the rules made by the State committee, were unable to secure such cards of admission as they did not know where to go to obtain them and none had been supplied to them. In the meanwhile, the Taft faction had gathered in the hall, guarded as stated above, and were proceeding hurriedly to go through the form of transacting the business of the State convention.

The facts stated above had led, of course, to a tense and excited feeling between the Taft and Roosevelt men gathering in Aberdeen for the convention. The governor of the State had been called to Aberdeen in order that his assistance might be obtained to prevent violence and to bring about, if possible, some just arrangement for the proceedings of the convention. Conferences between committees representing the Taft and the Roosevelt factions were held at 9 o'clock a. m., May 15, 1912, an agreement was made between these committees and signed by B. W. Coiner, Taft leader, and chairman of the State committee, that the two meetings consisting one of the Taft delegates, and the other of the Roosevelt delegates, would adjourn until 1 o'clock in the afternoon. In violation of this agreement, at 10 o'clock the Taft delegates proceeded in the manner stated to go through the form of holding a State convention and disposed of the business before them in a hurried manner, adjourning in a little over an hour.

This gathering of Taft adherents, purporting to be a State convention, elected a full Taft delegation of 14 to the Chicago convention, and this illegal delegation was seated by the national committee and voted throughout the proceedings of that convention.

The Taft State committee by eliminating the Roosevelt delegation of 121 from King County, of 10 from Chelan County, of 8 from Mason County, and eliminating contested Roosevelt delegations from 8 other counties and substituting in their places an equal number of Taft delegates, made up a temporary roll for the State committee in which Taft had 336 delegates. After all of this arbitrary and illegal unseating of Roosevelt delegates Taft was only left with a majority of two in the State convention, which consisted of 668 members. Of course this margin was narrow, but in view of the fact, as stated above, that great numbers of even those Roosevelt delegates, who were entitled to sit in the convention even by the ruling of the Taft State committee, could not gain admission because they had no cards of admission and did not know where to obtain them (the proceedings of the Taft convention meanwhile going rapidly forward) this margin was sufficient for all practical purposes for the Taft contingent.

Being excluded from the convention hall, which had been seized and held by force by the State committee, 567 Roosevelt delegates met in a separate hall and, constituting a large majority of the delegates to the State convention, proceeded to choose delegates to the national convention at Chicago.

The Taft State committee held that the Roosevelt delegates from Pierce and Clallam Counties were entitled to seats in the State convention.

As will be seen from the numbers given above it was necessary for them to exclude the Roosevelt delegates from every other county in which the Taft people had instituted contests—11 in all—in order that the Taft people should obtain control of the State convention.

As to the illegality of the proceedings of this State committee, it will be sufficient to review briefly the facts as to the county delegations from King, Chelan, Mason, and Asotin Counties—in view of the fact that it is perfectly clear that the Taft delegates which the State committee seated from these counties had no just claim as delegates to the convention; and the unseating of the Taft delegation from either one of these counties or from either one of the other contested counties where Taft delegations were seated would have given Roosevelt a majority of the convention, even on the temporary roll as made up by the Taft State committee.

Under the law the State of Washington has no original statutory primary for electing delegates to a national convention or to a State convention. The manner of choosing delegates to the convention was largely in the discretion of the State and county committees. The State committee directed that the State convention be called at Aberdeen with 668 members, which convention in turn should choose delegates to the national convention at Chicago. As to the selection of delegates to the State convention, the State committee directed that the county committee in each county should choose the method of so doing. Under the authority of the State committee each county committee could, if it saw fit, itself choose the delegation from the county to the State convention, or it could call a county convention which in turn should choose the delegation to the State convention; and when it called a county convention it had the authority of submitting the election of delegates to the county convention to the people at a primary; or it could submit the election of delegates to the State convention to a primary. Such primaries, if called, were held under the direction of the county committee, as there was no statute governing the same.

Under this authority some of the county delegates to the Aberdeen convention were chosen by the county committees, and some were chosen by county conventions selected by primaries ordered by the county committees. Either method was authorized by the law and by the party rules.

In Spokane County an opportunity was had to test popular sentiment as between Roosevelt and Taft at a primary called by the county committee to elect a county convention in which the votes cast were about eight for Roosevelt to one for Taft. Primaries were also held in Pierce, Clallam, King, and other counties, showing an overwhelming Roosevelt sentiment as opposed to Taft in the State.

In King County, in pursuance of its authority, the county committee, consisting of some 400 members, met and, over the opposition of the Taft minority in the committee, directed the calling of a county convention to choose delegates to the State convention at Aberdeen, and directed a primary in the county to be held to elect delegates to the county convention, providing the form of ballot and other details of the primary. This primary was held in pursuance of this order; 6,900 votes were cast at it, of which all but some 500 were for Roosevelt and LA FOLLETTE, giving the progressives overwhelming control of the King County convention. There is no contention that this primary election was not perfectly free and open and honestly conducted. The right of the 121 Roosevelt delegates to the Aberdeen convention is based upon this regular and popular proceeding. The Taft people claim that the county committee was improperly constituted, because its chairman had appointed members of the committee from precincts in which there were vacancies. The chairman, however, had such authority both by the rules of the committee and by an express resolution of the committee, which resolution was presented on the hearing before the national committee. The Taft people also claim that the primary was not in technical accordance with the provision of a certain statute. This statute, however, has no application to such primaries, and relates only to voluntary primaries for the election of delegates to nominating conventions. A strenuous effort had been made to secure either a statute or a rule of the State committee for such a primary for the election of delegates to the nominating convention at Chicago, but the governor refused to call a session of the legislature for that purpose and the Taft State committee refused to make such a rule, and no such primary could be held, notwithstanding the earnest efforts of the Roosevelt people throughout the State. These flimsy pretexts were the only objections which the Taft people could devise to the Roosevelt delegation from King County. On the other hand, the Taft delegation from that county which was seated in the State convention at Aberdeen by the Taft State committee rested its claims upon the pretended appointment made by 14 Taft members of the King County committee after the King County committee had directed the primary for the selection of delegates, as stated above.

Of course these 14 men had no authority to make such appointment. They claimed to be acting as an executive committee of the county committee. In the first place, this executive committee had been discharged by the full county committee and had no existence at the time; its authority had been revoked and another method, namely, the primary and the county convention, had been directed by the county committee for the selection of delegates to the State convention at Aberdeen. Among other methods used by the Taft party in Seattle in pursuance of their determination to secure, by fair means or foul, the delegations from King County to the State convention, and thereby the State delegation to the national convention, was the attempt to bribe outright the chairman of the King County committee and the alteration and forgery of proxies for seats in the county committee, conclusive proof of which, in documentary form, was presented to the national committee and the credentials committee at Chicago, and ignored by them, although not disputed.

Under these circumstances it is perfectly manifest that the so-called Taft delegation from King County, which did not claim to have any other authority than this appointment by the 12 or 14 members of the King County committee, had no authority whatever to represent King County in the Aberdeen convention. The action of the Taft State committee could not create any such authority for it, and the arbitrary seating of this illegal delegation of 121 in the Aberdeen convention, by which seating the Taft people gave themselves a majority of 2 on the temporary roll, upon which authority they selected 14 delegates to the national convention, vitiated and made wholly illegal this purported Taft delegation to Chicago.

The acceptance of this unauthorized delegation from the State of Washington by the national committee was equally without validity.

When the temporary roll of the Chicago convention, including these 14 delegates, had been made up by the national committee in this arbitrary and illegal manner the 14 delegates themselves practically voted to retain themselves in the convention by voting upon the temporary chairmanship and temporary organization of the convention, thereby, together with other illegal delegations similarly situated, selecting their own credentials committee and voting upon their own unfounded and unmeritorious cases.

In Chelan County a county convention was held to elect delegates to the State convention. No question was raised as to the validity of this county convention. It met in the forenoon and proceeded to ballot upon the election of a temporary chairman. The membership of the convention was 55. On the vote for temporary chairman 31 votes were cast for D. D. Olds, the Roosevelt candidate, and 22 for Cohler, the Taft candidate. After perfecting this temporary organization the convention adjourned and awaited the report of its committee on credentials, having adopted a resolution that it would reconvene at 1 o'clock in the afternoon. Between this adjournment and the hour of 1 o'clock the minority of Taft delegates held a separate meeting and went through the form of choosing delegates to the State convention. They did not return to the convention at 1 o'clock in the afternoon. This wholly unauthorized Taft delegation of 10, appointed by a bolting minority of the county convention, was seated in the State convention by the State committee, and the regularly elected delegation, which was for Roosevelt, was excluded. Leaving out of consideration King County and every other county in which the Roosevelt delegations were excluded, the seating of the Roosevelt delegation from Chelan County would have given Roosevelt control of the State convention. The illegal unseating of this delegation also vitiated the action of the State convention and rendered invalid and unauthorized the Taft delegation from the State of Washington.

So likewise in Mason County. The State committee seated a Taft delegation of 8 from that county which had no other authority whatever than a pretended appointment by two precinct committeemen. The county committee of Mason County consisted of 21 precinct committeemen. It is perfectly clear that two of these had no authority whatever to appoint the delegates to the State convention. On the other hand, the Roosevelt delegation from Mason County was appointed by 11 precinct committeemen present at a meeting, constituting a majority and a quorum of the county committee and fuly authorized to make the appointment. This authorized delegation was refused seats in the convention by the Taft State committee. It was not contended either before the national committee or the credentials committee of the Chicago convention that this action was valid in any way whatever, and yet it was decisive of the entire action of the State convention at Aberdeen, so far as the Taft control was concerned, and the unseating of this Roosevelt delegation from Mason County rendered invalid the entire proceedings of the so-called Taft State convention and the Taft delegation from Washington.

Likewise, in Asotin County the 6 Taft delegates seated by the State committee from that county were necessary to give Taft the majority of 2, which the State committee worked out upon the temporary roll. The only authority which these 6 Taft delegates from Asotin County had was the pretended appointment of 5 persons purporting to act as members of the county committee. The county committee consisted of 11. Only 3 of the 5 persons referred to were members of the committee; the other 2 were not members and had no proxies. They so admitted, and the fact was not disputed. The action of these 3 members of the committee and 2 persons without any claim of right whatever acting with them in appointing the Taft delegation from Asotin County was purely arbitrary, unauthorized, and illegal. The seating of these illegal 6 delegates by the State committee being necessary to give them their majority of 2 rendered invalid the action of the entire convention, invalidated the delegation of 14 to the national convention, and in view of the fact that this 14 and a few other delegates similarly stolen were necessary to give Mr. Taft his slender majority it rendered illegal entirely his nomination at the Chicago convention.

Likewise, the seating of the Roosevelt delegation from either one of the six other contested counties, as they were entitled to be seated, would have given Roosevelt control of the State convention. But in view of the clear cases of the counties especially described in the foregoing, either one of which if the rights of the Roosevelt delegation had been recognized would have destroyed the small Taft majority of two upon the temporary roll of the State convention made up by the Taft State committee, it is not necessary to go into the details of the other counties.

The call of the State committee provided that 8 delegates were to be chosen from the State at large by the State convention and 2 delegates from each one of the three congressional districts, making 14 in all. The 2 delegates from each district were to be chosen by a district convention which was to consist of the delegates from that district to the State convention, which delegates should meet separately pending the State convention at Aberdeen, and as a district convention choose the 2 delegates from the district. Each of the three districts in the State had an overwhelming majority of Roosevelt delegates, but the case of the third district is especially conspicuous because of the almost entire absence of Taft sentiment in that district, which consists of the eastern part of the State. Over 200 of the 245 delegates to Aberdeen were Roosevelt delegates.

In only two counties were there contests involving in all 16 delegates, and yet under the proceedings of the State committee Taft delegates were sent from this district as from the other districts and from the State at large to Chicago, their contention being that the Roosevelt delegates from the district did not attend the State convention and were not entitled to be recognized. As a matter of fact, Roosevelt delegates from the district did attend the State convention as stated above, but met in a separate hall from the Taft delegates, on account of the hall being forcibly seized by the State committee, and legitimate Roosevelt delegates from Chelan, King, and other counties excluded by force and violence, as stated above.

A further matter which ought not to be overlooked in considering the action of the Chicago convention is the fact that only a mere pretense at an investigation of these contested cases was made by the national committee, or by the credentials committee, or by the Chicago convention itself. In the Washington cases, after some difficulty, 45 minutes was secured for presenting the cases on behalf of the Roosevelt delegation before the national committee. The terms laid down by the committee were that the Roosevelt case would be stated first, occupying the entire 45 minutes, and that the Taft case should then be stated, occupying its 45 minutes, and that no time should be allowed for rebuttal. Under this arrangement oral statements were made and representatives of the Taft delegation in their oral statement made a great many statements of fact which were claimed by the Roosevelt representatives to be wholly unfounded and false. Attempts were made at frequent intervals to gain permission to correct or contradict these false statements, but every such attempt was prevented and every opportunity of making any corrections of the same was cut off. Vehement protests were made by Taft members of the committee against any interruption of the Taft speakers, and at the conclusion of the oral statement orders were given that the representatives of the two sides should collect their papers and immediately leave the committee room—which, with the officious assistance of the sergeant at arms, was done. On disputed points a vast mass of original and documentary evidence was offered on behalf of the Roosevelt delegation. None of this was examined by the committee nor was any attention paid to it whatever. The case, after the oral statements above referred to, was decided instantaneously by the committee without consideration or examination of evidence. The writer of this, who assisted in presenting the Roosevelt case to the committee, left the room immediately at the conclusion of the oral statements and proceeded directly to the outer door of the committee rooms. But before he reached the outer door a messenger from the committee room passed him on his way to the telegraph office announcing as he passed that the case had been decided against the Roosevelt delegation.

Likewise the proceedings before the credentials committee of the temporary organization was a travesty upon a hearing and investigation for the purpose of eliciting the truth and making a just decision. Angry and vehement protests were made by Taft members of the committee against the efforts on the part of other members of the committee who sought to question the representatives of the Taft delegation in order to elicit the truth; and, being sustained by the chairman, under this gag every attempt on the part either of the representatives of the Roosevelt delegation or of members of the committee who sought to bring out the facts was cut off and entirely suppressed. In fact, throughout the hearings, both before the national committee and the credentials committee, indifference was indicated by the majority of these committees as to the hearings—their decisions undoubtedly having ben made in advance upon a partisan basis and such decision and fact having been announced previously by members of the committee.

When it is considered that the credentials committee referred to consisted in part of the very illegal delegates whose cases were to be tried before the committee the absurdity of the system is manifest.

Likewise it may be repeated—it can not be repeated too often—that the national committee, which was the source of the arbitrary power of the convention and of its temporary roll, which in turn chose its temporary organization, which in turn chose its permanent organization, and which controlled every question decided by the convention, was a hold-over committee of politicians selected by party machinery four years ago, when neither the issues nor the candidates of this campaign were before them or before the people; that, in the meanwhile, many of the members of the committee had been supplanted by the election of their successors of opposite views in regard to candidates and policies of the party; that the majority of the members who assumed to act upon these cases had been directly and emphatically repudiated by the party in their States at free primaries where large party votes were cast; that acting with them and going to make up the majority of the committee were members from Territories which have no electoral vote and from Southern States which have no substantial Republican Party; and that not a single Republican State in this year's preconvention campaign where a free vote of the membership of the party had been allowed was in harmony with the majority of this national committee, which controlled the convention and all its actions. The latter circumstances are mentioned, not for the purpose of going here into a discussion of the iniquities of the system involved, but merely as bearing upon the merits of the decision rendered by the tribunal referred to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I have 20 minutes to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal to reply to some statements made by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow he be allowed 20 minutes in which to reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I want to call up the general deficiency bill——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have the right to speak in general debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to get into my bill, and the gentleman can then get time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to modify the request and change it to immediately after the calling up of the general deficiency bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his request on the statement that I intend to call up the general deficiency bill, and that I desire to pass the bill before the end of this week, and we will accommodate the gentleman if 20 minutes or a half an hour will suffice.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his request?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I withdraw my request.

FILLING OF VACANCIES ON COMMITTEES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to fill some vacancies on committees. I move that Mr. SWEET, of Michigan, be elected to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Accounts made vacant by the resignation of Mr. RODDENBERY, of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that Mr. SWEET, of Michigan, be elected as a member of the Committee on Accounts to fill a vacancy. Is there any other nomination?

The question was taken, and the nomination was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to present his resignation from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have not reached that point yet.

The SPEAKER. Is there any other nomination for this vacancy?

Mr. MANN. I ask that the resignation of Mr. MONDELL from the Committee on Public Lands be accepted.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I move the election of the following gentlemen to fill vacancies on the minority end of the following committees:

Hon. FRANK W. MONDELL, of Wyoming, on the Committee on Appropriations to succeed Mr. MALBY, deceased; Hon. ELMER A. MORSE, of Wisconsin, to the Committee on Public Lands, to succeed Mr. MONDELL, resigned; Hon. WILLIAM F. VARE, of Pennsylvania, on the Committee on Insular Affairs, to succeed Mr. HUBBARD, deceased; Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, of Illinois, on the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, to succeed Mr. FRENCH, resigned; Hon. JOHN A. STERLING, of Illinois, on the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The question was taken, and the nominations were agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BOOHER, for 12 days, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. SLEMP, for 3 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CARY, for 10 days, on account of illness.

ARMY WORM.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have here a House joint resolution asking for an appropriation of $5,000 to be used in the Southern States in the fight on the cotton or army worm. The Secretary of Agriculture, I will state to the House, came before the Committee on Agriculture yesterday and said that it was absolutely necessary to have this amount of money, and to have it now, to meet the conditions which have recently arisen in the cotton States. The resolution was favorably considered, and I was requested to report it to the House. It is now on the calendar, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HEFLIN. I make that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The request carries the further request that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 340) making appropriation to be used in exterminating the army worm.

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in exterminating a dangerous pest commonly called the army worm, now devastating crops in various section of the United States.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

On line 3, strike out the word "fifteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if this pest has made itself known anywhere outside of the State of Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. This worm has appeared in many Southern States—South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. In fact, it has appeared in nearly all of the cotton-growing States. I will say to the gentleman I read a newspaper report the other day of the operations and ravages of the worm in Georgia. It stated that they crossed a railroad track in such large numbers that they stopped the train. The worms being crushed made the track so slippery that they stopped the train and they had to put sand on the rails in order to travel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would suggest to the gentleman that that is an easy way of suppressing a corporation. But I want to know from the gentleman whether this request for an appropriation of Federal money arises in his own district and in his own State, or whether it is due to complaints that are general throughout the Southern States?

Mr. HEFLIN. The complaints are general, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The resolution was introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN], and the Agricultural Department has already sent one or two men down to instruct these people how to fight the worm and destroy it; and the Secretary of Agriculture came before the Committee on Agriculture yesterday and said that he did not have a dollar with which to proceed, and that with $5,000 he believed he could meet this emergency and that it was necessary to get this money now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to raise a question as between the States, but I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are numerous pests throughout the United States that ought to be suppressed. There are certain pests in horticulture and arboriculture. There is a chestnut-tree blight which is now pervading a number of the States of the Union.

Mr. MANN. We made an appropriation for the investigation of that, I think.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that the Senate has put in the agricultural bill $80,000 for the chestnut blight, and the House conferees in the first reading agreed that that sum should be left in the bill, and I presume the conferees of the House will not object any further.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that unfortunately these worms do not limit their diet to corporations. I am a personal witness to the fact that their operations are not limited to getting on railroad tracks and obstructing trains. I have just returned from Georgia, and I have witnessed myself the ravages of these worms there. While there I sent a telegram to the Secretary of Agriculture, telling him of their ravages in Georgia and eastern Alabama—parts of the country I knew about. He replied that they had no funds. My town held a meeting and raised the funds and sent men over the county with the ingredients which kill these worms. That is limited, of course. Yesterday I was informed by the Department of Agriculture that if this provision was made as reported by the committee a man would be sent there to help those people.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Still reserving the right to object, it is a rather interesting fact that these worms to which the gentleman refers are eating up the very valuable ties that come from chestnut trees, which are preferable, as I understand, to any other wooden ties that are in use in the Southern States, and the chestnut trees are subject to the blight.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving further the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman one more question. I should like to know——

Mr. ADAMSON. Speaking of chestnuts, I do not want to use any chestnuts, but I want the gentleman to understand that we have never resisted any proper efforts to aid in relieving him or any of his people in any part of the country in any emergency affecting chestnuts, old chestnuts, or chestnut trees, or anything else.

Mr. MANN. You defeated an amendment to the appropriation bill to make an appropriation for the chestnut blight.

Mr. ADAMSON. Not I.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the State of Alabama made any appropriation for the extermination of this worm?

Mr. HEFLIN. The legislature in our State is not in session. The worm made its appearance in our State last year for the first time, I believe, in about 20 years, and this year the worm is appearing in greater numbers in all the States than before, and this appropriation is to meet an emergency now, because the appropriation bill will not pass in time to relieve the situation in the South, and the Secretary of Agriculture submitted to us telegrams yesterday asking for aid. So acute and distressing is the situation the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] contributed to a sum to pay the expenses of one expert to be sent to South Carolina. They simply have not a dollar to meet this emergency. These worms, undisturbed in a cotton field of 20 acres, can destroy it in three or four days.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are also eating up the chestnut railroad ties. I shall not object.

Mr. MANN. The understanding is that the committee amendment is to be agreed to, reducing the amount?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; to $5,000.

Mr. MANN. Is this reimbursable?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. Is this an additional appropriation over what is carried in the appropriation bill when it becomes a law?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes, sir; to meet an emergency.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman. I can remember seeing the army worms so thick in a field that you could not step without treading on a dozen of them at a time.

Mr. HOBSON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. And I withdraw my reservation of the right to object.

Mr. ADAMSON. And I withdraw mine.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve the right to object when I get the opportunity.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that this experience with the army worm is very widespread. The worm is now in my district. It came last year, and it came again this year very suddenly, and it does not give time for preparation. We have to have mass meetings in order to meet the situation. The whole county of Tuscaloosa, for instance, was ravaged last year within a very few days.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to see the worm exterminated in the gentleman's district, but last year we suffered in my section of the country from the ravages of the chestnut blight. I understand it is now advancing down into the Southern States and is there threatening the gentleman's territory. All I ask is that Congress shall give consideration also to this matter of the chestnut blight. We have already made an appropriation in Pennsylvania—a very ample appropriation of $275,000—but we have no authority to go beyond the boundaries of our own State.

Mr. HOBSON. I wish that steps had been taken in that direction, as suggested by the gentleman, several years ago. I can say to the gentleman that the chestnut trees in my district are almost wholly destroyed by the chestnut blight. But the need of meeting this army worm pest is very urgent, and it should be met within a very few weeks. Owing to the spread of this worm, the need for its extermination is liable to become very wide, and if the situation is not promptly met to-day it can not be treated successfully two weeks hence.

I believe it would be a wise matter to leave the expenditure of the original amount carried in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. Then he would not be compelled to expend all that he has unless it is desirable, and later on if he should find it important to expend all the money he would then have it available.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. HOBSON. I do.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from Alabama that the Secretary of Agriculture informed the committee yesterday that this sum of $5,000 would be sufficient to carry him over the emergency that is now existing, until the agricultural appropriation bill could be brought out of conference. We have the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture to the effect that that would be sufficient.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from South Carolina states that this appropriation will be sufficient to tide over this emergency until the agricultural appropriation bill is agreed to. Why can not the funds now at the disposal of the department be used for this purpose?

Mr. LEVER. We understand from the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture that he has no funds at his disposal at this time which he might devote to this purpose.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not one dollar.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman where will he get it in the appropriation bill if it is agreed to? What fund would it be paid from?

Mr. LEVER. It would be paid from the general fund covering all cases of this kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the month of July the Secretary of Agriculture has had, under the joint resolution that was passed, one-twelfth of that fund for application to this work, and if the appropriation bill had become a law prior to the 1st of July he could have expended in the month of July only one-twelfth of the sum appropriated.

Mr. LEVER. I assume, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of Agriculture at this time has his men engaged in their regular projects, and that the only way he can send extra men down there to meet this emergency would be through this emergency appropriation. That was the impression the Secretary gave to the committee yesterday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would be the fact after the general appropriation bill becomes a general law, and inasmuch as there is no extraordinary increase in the appropriation, there will be no opportunity to send additional men out. The Secretary of Agriculture is pretty smooth. It is not all so easy in these matters. What do these men propose to do? Do they propose to tell the people how to spray the plants with some solution?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is one of the things they would do. The expert men will go down to these infected parts of the States and call the people together and instruct them how to get rid of these worms.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They could mail that information to the people much more quickly.

Mr. HEFLIN. There is nothing like going among them and showing them how to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suppose they would send out and have meetings called and conduct their meetings and have speeches and demonstrations, and in the meantime the army worm will have got in his work, when its ravages could be more speedily prevented by the prompt transmission of information as to how the pest could be exterminated. The method which the gentleman from Alabama suggests is not a very practical way of doing the business.

Mr. LEVER. I will say that from the information we have the process is simple. But I want the gentleman to understand that this is the second year in my experience for the visitation of the army worm in my State. Last year it came to the State during the fall. It reached our cotton fields just about the time the best part of the cotton had matured, and it was really a blessing to us. But now it is coming to the State at a time when, if it gets into the cotton fields, it is bound to work absolute destruction not only to the cotton, but to corn and even grass.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is speaking of the worm, not the cotton-boll weevil?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if there is a special appropriation in the agricultural appropriation bill for this purpose?

Mr. LEVER. No. They have been handling the situation heretofore under a general fund.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will state to the gentleman that we did not have the worm until last year in anything like the number that we have now. As my friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has stated, the worm attacked the cotton then when the bolls were nearly grown, and only ate the leaves. Now the worms attack the limbs and the little bolls, and they absolutely destroy the tender plants.

Mr. SIMS. I understand that they are eating corn and everything else down in that section. Hundreds of acres are depleted of corn and cotton and everything else. I was talking with Senator PERCY, of Mississippi, about it yesterday.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I am not opposed to this, but I should like to have the gentleman explain how far $5,000 will go toward exterminating this worm in several States.

Mr. HEFLIN. It will pay the expenses of experts, who will go down there and explain to the people how to deal with the worm.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. That is how this money is to be used?

Mr. LEVER. Entirely so, to pay the expenses of these men.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not opposed to this appropriation, but I want to learn something about the habits of the Department of Agriculture, and this is a very good time to learn it. That department has had a fund to deal with epidemics of this sort. Recently, by a joint resolution, they have been authorized to expend one-twelfth of the amount that was appropriated for the last year. The gentleman now says he is of the impression that the Agricultural Department has already allotted all of that fund. What I am trying to find out is this: Does that department allot all of that emergency fund without having any reserve at all for an emergency, and did the gentleman cross-examine the department officials to ascertain the facts?

Mr. LEVER. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to say that the department has its various lines of work blocked out, so many dollars for one item, so many dollars for another line of work.

Mr. SHERLEY. They did not have any blocked out for this.

Mr. LEVER. Under a general provision in the agricultural bill we permit them a leeway of 10 per cent from one fund to another. Now, I take it, from the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture yesterday, that he is carrying on his projects which have been marked out, and that his men have been designated to do the work under these appropriations. I take it that the department has sent out its available experts to carry out the projects that have been mapped out for this year's work.

Mr. SHERLEY. I should like to know what the policy of the department is. In the first place, did they use any of this fund last year for the purpose of fighting this particular pest?

Mr. LEVER. As far as I know, they did not, because the army worm got into operation last year too late to do any serious damage. They have been studying the problem, and they have worked out a method of destroying the army worm. What this appropriation proposes to do is to send a few experts into the South and pay their expenses, to show the people how to fight the worm.

Mr. SHERLEY. Last year they knew about this worm.

Mr. LEVER. They have known about it for 35 years.

Mr. SHERLEY. They have a general fund to cover these matters this year. Does the gentleman know whether they have allotted any of the one-twelfth authorized for this year to this purpose?

Mr. LEVER. I really could not tell the gentleman. The truth is, as I said a moment ago, that the department has worked out a complete remedy for the army worm, and it is nothing more than the using of a little arsenic and flour on these little devils to kill them. But this appropriation here is asked for the purpose of permitting the department to send a few of its men into these various communities to show the folks there how to use this instrument of destruction.

Mr. HEFLIN. And this money is to be used to pay their expenses.

Mr. SHERLEY. This month is pretty nearly out. They have had one-twelfth of the total appropriation, which is a considerable sum—more than $5,000. Does the gentleman know or has he inquired how much has been spent, or how much has been allotted for purposes of this kind, or anything in this connection?

The reason I ask this question is this: My experience is that the Department of Agriculture, as well as certain other departments, gets certain general funds for the doing of work in anticipation of just such situations as this, and then when a particular emergency comes, instead of using the general fund that has been provided in anticipation of that, they take the particular emergency as a means to bring pressure upon Congress to force additional appropriations.

Mr. LEVER. In reply to that suggestion, let me say to the gentleman that I take it that inasmuch as the month is nearly up, whatever allotment has been made for this month has been practically exhausted, and therefore the necessity of this appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman think it is up to the department to show what the facts are? We have nothing here—no statement at all—as to how much money they have on hand or what they can expend it for.

Mr. LEVER. I think it is quite reasonable to assume that if they have allotted a certain fund for the present month, which is practically out, that certain fund has been exhausted. I think that is the logic of that situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to object, for I am in favor of the bill, but I should like about five minutes in which to speak on it.

Mr. MANN. Why not first ascertain if there is objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Let us find out if there is objection to the consideration of the bill first. Then the gentleman can get the time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this proposition, because I happen to know of the necessity for immediate and speedy action, and I am in favor of some propositions of this kind, but I happen to have in my hand some fundamental doctrine in regard to the making of appropriations, coming from a Democrat, a gentleman by the name of Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.] I will take the time to read it in order that the Members of the House on both sides may understand his position in regard to matters of this kind and also indirectly in regard to another Democratic proposition now attached to the Post Office appropriation bill, by which the United States Government will be compelled to pay $20,000,000 a year rent for the use of the public highways on which rural free-delivery carriers are now delivering mails for the benefit of the people. I read from Woodrow Wilson's "Congressional Government," in the introductory thereto, at page 29, written in 1900. He was then writing in regard to making congressional appropriations, which is what is being done now. He says:

> Hardly less significant and real, for instance, are its moral effects in rendering State administrations less self-reliant and efficient, less prudent and thrifty, by accustoming them to accept subsidies for internal improvements from the Federal coffers; to depending upon the national revenues, rather than upon their own energy and enterprise, for means of developing those resources which it should be the special province of State administrations to make available and profitable.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is good doctrine. We believe in that in New England. To continue:

> There can, I suppose, be little doubt that it is due to the moral influences of this policy that the States are now turning to the common Government for aid in such things as education. Expecting to be helped, they will not help themselves. Certain it is that there is more than one State which, though abundantly able to pay for an educational system of the greatest efficiency, fails to do so, and contents itself with imperfect, temporary makeshifts because there are immense surpluses every year in the National Treasury, which rumor and unauthorized promises say may be distributed among the States in aid of education. If the Federal Government were more careful to keep apart from every strictly local scheme of improvement—

And I commend this to the wise chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—

> If the Federal Government were more careful to keep apart from every strictly local scheme of improvement, this culpable and demoralizing State policy could scarcely live. States would cease to wish, because they would cease to hope to be stipendiaries of the Union, and would address themselves to their proper duties with much benefit both to themselves and to the Federal system.

I commend that to the majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The Democrats are in favor of the principles enunciated, but not in favor of their application.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the majority, I want to say to the gentleman that that is the best speech he ever made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood the gentleman from Connecticut to say that he believed in that doctrine, or that the New England States did.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that why they have so persistently obtained appropriations to exterminate the gypsy moth up in New England?

Mr. HILL. There has been no appropriation asked for by the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two or three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, as supplementary to what I have read, in view of the fact that that has thoroughly met the approval of gentlemen on the other side of the House, I shall read another extract, direct and apt to this occasion, for I am watching with great interest the developments of the future.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let us print the whole book.

Mr. HILL. Very well. I think very likely that will be done.

Mr. CLAYTON. It will be the best contribution the gentleman has ever made to congressional literature. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I shall read another thing which I think is worthy of consideration. I refer to another extract from the distinguished gentleman's writings, in which he discusses presidential candidates. It is found in the introductory to "Congressional Government," on page 43. He is discussing presidential conventions and candidates, and he says:

When the presidential candidate came to be chosen it was recognized as imperatively necessary that he should have as short a political record as possible and that he should wear a clean and irreproachable insignificance.

[Laughter.]

"Gentlemen," said a distinguished American public man, "I would make an excellent President, but a very poor candidate." A decisive career which gives a man a well-understood place in public estimation constitutes a positive disability for the Presidency, because candidacy must precede election, and the shoals of candidacy can be passed only by a light boat, which carries little freight—and can be turned readily about to suit the intricacies of the passage.

[Laughter.]

I doubt if he ever expected to be a candidate himself when he wrote that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to consume any more of the time of the House, and I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the House joint resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution as amended.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEFLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request for leave of absence, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SWITZER requests leave of absence, for five days, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he commence to object on his own side first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will give notice that, as far as I am concerned, on account of the condition of business in the House and the necessity of a quorum being present, I shall hereafter object to any request for unanimous consent for leave of absence on account of business. If a man is sick or there is sickness in his family, that may be a legitimate excuse, but the important business of a man who holds a commission from a constituency to represent them on the floor of this House is for him to attend here and to be present at this time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama insist upon his objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the gentleman, but I do not think he ought to make any objection without first giving notice.

Mr. BUTLER. Because we will see that there is a quorum here every minute. I am able to do that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman need not do that. We will bring a quorum here and have brought one here, and it has not come from that side of the House. I have no desire to reflect upon the application of any gentleman upon that side of the House, to begin with, and, therefore, as the leader of the minority asks me to give notice I will accept his proposition and withdraw objection to this particular request. I should not withdraw it, however, had the request come from this side of the House. I do give notice now that under the present congested condition of business and the necessity for a quorum being present, no leave of absence which is asked for on account of business shall be granted in the future, until the condition of business in the House is cleared up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman change his request and have the sundry civil bill printed, showing the Senate amendments, because until I can see the Senate amendments——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would be glad to do that, and will make the request that the bill be printed with Senate amendments numbered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, to disagree to the Senate amendments——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman insists upon doing that, I said I would not be willing to give consent until the Members of the House had an opportunity to examine the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood what the gentleman from Illinois said, and the gentleman from New York said it was agreeable, so the Chair was putting the whole request at once.

Mr. MANN. I was trying to save time, because the gentleman knows otherwise I would have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the sundry civil bill be printed with Senate amendments numbered and that the bill remain on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill be printed with Senate amendments numbered and that it remain on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. It does not require unanimous consent to remain on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Well, that may be superfluous. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. The Speaker just put the motion. The request of the gentleman from Illinois is to have the bill printed. Does that mean printed in the RECORD?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; to have it printed with the Senate amendments numbered and in italics.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my motion to take up the bill H. R. 20728, the Indian appropriation bill, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference thereon.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman if he will not make an exception in this case, on page 35, to the amendment in regard to John West's claim and concur in the Senate amendment in reference to that claim?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not think in a conference of this kind either the Senate or the House conferees ought to be bound in any respect, but that there ought to be a free conference, and as to this claim the matter is now pending before this House on a report from the committee. It is a separate bill which has been put on as an amendment on the Indian appropriation bill, and it should not be there. These claims of this character ought not to be placed on appropriation bills, and as the bill is now upon the calendar here if it can not be passed this session it can be passed the next. This claim is 70 years old, and I do not think it will suffer any by remaining over until next winter, even if we can not reach it this session. It is on the calendar now, and the gentleman can call it up any time under the rule, and let the matter be discussed before this House, and pass it in a proper and orderly way.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, just one word more. I only asked the chairman to do this because this bill is one of the gentleman's original bills, introduced in 1909, and therefore, having passed this committee of which the gentleman is chairman by a clear majority, and the bill being in this House represented by a majority, of course the gentleman knows, by reason of seniority upon the committee, he will have upon that committee those who represent the minority in the report, and consequently unless the gentleman will make an exception in this case, knowing, as I said, who the conferees will be, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

DAM ACROSS WHITE RIVER, ARK.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table two conference reports.

The SPEAKER. Which one does the gentleman desire taken up first?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not care which. One is aids to navigation and the other is a bill to construct a dam.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20347) to authorize the Dixie Power Co. to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask that the report be read, as it is shorter than the statement.

The conference report was read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1059).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20347) to authorize the Dixie Power Co. to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

W. C. ADAMSON,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
F. C. STEVENS,
Managers on the part of the House.

KNUTE NELSON,
JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The bill adopted by the House originally granted the consent of Congress for the construction of a dam in accordance with the general dam act. The Senate amendment was explained by its author and by the managers on the part of the Senate to be rendered appropriate and necessary by local conditions. While the amendment is unusual and considered by the managers on the part of the House as of doubtful necessity, we consented to recede from our disagreement to the amendment and accept same with the distinct understanding that it is not to be accepted as a precedent for adding to individual bills particular statements of detailed legislation, but stands upon its own particular facts and is agreed to for the reason aforesaid.

W. C. ADAMSON,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
F. C. STEVENS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Senate amendment be reported.

The Senate amendment was reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has reported to the House this session a number of bills providing for the construction of a number of dams across navigable waters, to be constructed, maintained, and operated in accordance with the provisions of the general dam law governing such matters. This bill, I believe, is the only one which has passed recently. The other day a number of bills were upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar and were all stricken off on the objection of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], whom I regret does not happen to be present at this time. Of course, agreeing to the conference report upon this bill is practically enacting it into law, and this bill, outside of the Senate amendment, stands upon all fours with the other special dam bills which have been reported. Personally I have reached the conclusion that in the present condition of legislation that it is entirely proper for Congress to pass bills authorizing the construction of dams for the generation of electric power, to be governed by the provisions of the general law upon the subject.

Whether any changes can be made in the existing law I do not undertake to say, but that law, rather restrictive in its provisions, contains the additional provision, without any liability on the part of the Government for any damages caused, that it may at any time repeal, alter, or amend not only the general law but any special law that is passed providing for the construction of any special dam. I believe that it is highly desirable that as far as may be practicable we shall utilize the water power of the country now going to waste, reserving to the Government the complete power at any time in the future to extend its jurisdiction and authority over any of the dams which are constructed or over any of the companies which own or operate those dams. And when the House passes this bill or agrees to this conference report, in my judgment, it is practically, if they do that, a settlement of its policy upon the subject at this time. The House ought not to say to one company at one place, "We grant you this privilege there," and not say to another company at another place, under practically similar conditions, "We will not grant it there." This dam is to be constructed in Arkansas, but if it were in Tennessee, in the district of my friend [Mr. AUSTIN], it ought to receive the same consideration that it does when the dam happens to be located in a Democratic district.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am ready for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr FOSTER. I wanted to say just a word in reference to this conference report and the policy of granting rights to build dams for power purposes. I disagree with my colleague [Mr. MANN] in the fact that if this conference report on the bill, which is somewhat different, possibly, from other bills granting the right of constructing dams, should go through, this is the fixed policy of the Government in reference to what should be done in the near future in granting rights to water-power companies.

Mr. MANN. I did not say it was the fixed policy.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean the policy at this session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. If this bill passes and this conference report is agreed to, that ought to settle the question, because if any of them are to be rejected, this is one that ought to be rejected. I think we ought to grant the privilege where the committee has reported that there are no unusual circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. But I want to further disagree with the gentleman from Illinois in his idea that we should commence on Members on this side of the House who have bills for water-power sites and dams. I want to call to his mind that one of the first bills that went over on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was introduced by a Member on this side of the House.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman does not think that I meant my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] objected because the bill was introduced by a Republican?

Mr. FOSTER. But I understood from the gentleman's remarks that we ought not to permit one from this side to go through at this time.

Mr. MANN. Here is the bill. Are you going to permit it to go through?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that this bill is much better than any of the bills that have gone through for a good while in that it does restrict the powers of this company to sell its power to consumers.

Mr. MANN. This bill, with the Senate amendment, is the worst bill we have ever had reported in the House on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the gentleman's opinion, to which I do not agree.

Mr. MANN. And it is the opinion of nearly everybody else who has examined it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that I have some ideas as to regulations in reference to granting sites for water power, and, so far as I am individually concerned, it is not my intention to obstruct legislation to grant rights of individuals or firms or corporations to build dams to create water power. But I do believe, and I expect to exercise my right as an individual Member of this House in all future cases that may come up here, that proper restrictions shall be placed in all these bills, if I am able to do so, in order that the people of this country may have some protection against what, in my mind, may lead to the control of all the water power of our rivers. I think in a few States that practically all the water power has gone into the hands of a few individuals—possibly one or two companies.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. And I am opposed to that, and I think my colleague is just as much opposed to it.

Mr. MANN. Quite. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean, of course, that is true as to any dams which have been constructed in accordance with the general dam law?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I do not know whether they have all been constructed under the terms of the general dam act or not.

Mr. MANN. Then, I will give the gentleman the information. They have not.

Mr. FOSTER. But, however that may be, I do not consider that the general dam act goes far enough, and I think my colleague agrees with me that there ought to be additional legislation along those lines.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my colleague from Illinois, the general dam act does not go as far as I would have had it go or as he would have it go. I do not believe that Congress or the majority of people agree with my views upon that subject, and meanwhile I am not in favor of withholding the right to construct dams because my own views have not been enacted into legislation. As long as there remains the authority in the General Government, Congress at any time can enact views as strong as my views, and as strong as the views of my colleague are, into law and make it applicable to all these bills that have passed. And that is the case.

Mr. FOSTER. I observe that under the terms of the general dam act and under these bills that usually go through the Senate and House, or at least through the House, the right to alter, amend, or repeal is expressly reserved. I think that under that section, or under that clause, after a power company has once become established Congress would find it a very difficult matter to repeal an act where the rights of a corporation or of individuals are vested in that property.
